EARLY IMPRINTS IN THE THOMAS A. EDISON COLLECTION OF AMERICAN SHEET MUSIC: ADDENDA TO SONNECK–UPTON AND TO WOLFE

BY CALVIN ELLIKER

As a country without a national library system, the United States has long been dependent upon the personal interests and labors of individual bibliographers to document much of the nation's early published output. Books such as that by Charles Evans, recording Americana from colonial times into the first quarter of the nineteenth century,[1] and those by Marjorie Crandall[2] and Richard Barksdale Harwell,[3] describing Confederate imprints, are particularly fine examples of these endeavors.

Though all three of these books include some music materials, the field of specialized documentation of early American music imprints is dominated by two major bibliographies; namely, those by Oscar George Theodore Sonneck (revised by William Treat Upton)[4] and by Richard J. Wolfe.[5] Sonneck's bibliography (hereafter, Sonneck–Upton) is devoted to imprints of the eighteenth century, while Wolfe's three–volume work (hereafter, Wolfe) was envisioned as a continuation of Sonneck–Upton with its scope encompassing the first quarter of the nineteenth century.

Compilation of these bibliographies was naturally dependent upon major collections of pertinent materials. Sonneck–Upton lists forty institutional and personal collections from which citations were derived and Wolfe lists forty–four with, inevitably, a degree of overlap. Of course not every collection of American music imprints—especially those in private hands—was open to examination by these bibliographers at the time of their researches and this is the case for the remarkable body of publications assembled from roughly 1896 to 1920 by Thomas Alva Edison to support the activities of his phonograph company. Relating the history of this collection and documenting its holdings in early American imprints germane to Sonneck–Upton and to Wolfe are the dual purposes of this essay.

Edison's interest in music is reported by no less an informant than his son Charles, a former Secretary of the Navy and Governor of New Jersey, in an article commissioned by Etude in 1947.[6] Though he invented and patented the first practical phonograph in 1877, Edison was slow to realize the vast potential his sound recording and reproducing processes held for transmitting music. Of the eleven initial applications Edison envisioned for his invention "Music" ranks fifth; following "Letter–writing," "Dictation," "Books," and "Educational Purposes," but preceding "Family Record," "Musical Boxes [and] Toys," "Advertising," "Speech and Other Utterances," and perfecting the telephone and telegraphy.[7] Moreover, as his son relates, by the following year Edison was engaged in his most famous work—development of the incandescent light—and further progress on his phonograph was set aside until 1887 when he entered patents for his wax cylinder and sapphire recording needle.[8]

In 1888 the Edison Phonograph Works and the Edison Phonograph Company were founded. At this time the phonograph business was concerned exclusively with office dictation—the second item in Edison's list of potential applications—and the Edison Company soon sold its rights to the North American Phonograph Company. This firm's practice of renting its equipment—rather than selling it—led to its financial failure in 1892, prompting Edison to buy back the rights in 1896. According to Charles Edison, "this date may really be considered the beginning of the musical phonograph business."[9]

Edison believed that "Music, next to religion, is the mind's greatest solace and also its greatest inspiration"[10] and he entered into the musical phonograph business with the same zeal and doggedness that characterized his scientific experiments: "There are few people, however, who have listened to a larger variety of musical selections, as he was in the habit of buying sheet music, literally by the ton, and wearing out his pianist as he listened to various compositions for hours at a time."[11] In this statement Charles Edison provides the first documented indication—though certainly casual and veiled—of both the existence and extent of the music collection amassed by his father. Indeed, the reference to Edison buying sheet music "literally by the ton" was no exaggeration, as this essay shall soon demonstrate.

Inter–office memoranda of the Edison Company now in possession of the Music Library at the University of Michigan indicate that two employees, identified only as Hayes and Welch, were mainly responsible for obtaining sheet music and it appears they may have purchased the residues of entire music stores, as well as the personal collections of many individuals. As the phonograph business grew, music publishers began to send Edison professional copies of new sheet–music releases in hopes of getting their songs recorded thus—unintentionally—further augmenting the size of his collection.[12]

Despite its initial success, by the 1920s the Edison Phonograph Company was losing the market to its competitors and the decision was made to withdraw from the recording business. The bulk of Edison's sheet–music collection[13] was crated and shipped to Henry Ford in Dearborn, Michigan.[14] Shortly after its arrival, Ford gave the sheet music—still in the unopened crates—to Betty Potter (Mrs. Charles E. Potter) of Chevy Chase, Maryland, who is said to have been Ford's niece. The crates were placed in storage in the baggage room of the Grand Trunk Railroad depot at Swartz Creek, Michigan, where they remained undisturbed for nearly forty years.

In 1963 a light industrialist from Flint, Michigan, named Bly Corning was looking for additional space for his expanding business and purchased the now–defunct Swartz Creek depot with its contents. In the crates filling the baggage room Corning found approximately seventeen tons of loose and bound sheet music wrapped in newspapers dating from 1921 to 1924. In that moment of discovery Corning joined the informal club of legendary American sheet music collectors that, over the years, included such illustrious names as Joseph Muller, J. Francis Driscoll, W. Lloyd Keepers, Elliott Shapiro, James J. Fuld, and Lester S. Levy. Levy quickly became something of a mentor to Corning, who preserved copies of their correspondence to the end of his life. Indeed, it was Levy's gentle but persistent questioning that caused Corning to reveal—and thus document in writing—the details of how he found the collection in the Swartz Creek depot.[15]

Corning hired Harry Dichter to evaluate the collection, apparently at Levy's suggestion. Dichter's written appraisal, dated 20 December 1963, indicates it took him three days to evaluate just one and one–half percent of the material. He placed a value of $8,500.00 on the collection and noted, "In my opinion, this collection is one of the largest and finest available discovered in this century, and in fact will not be duplicated in the future on the open market."[16]

Though he may have had a legitimate claim to the sheet music as railroad salvage abandoned on his property, Corning located the Potters and duly entered into negotiations with them to purchase the collection. On 19 March 1964 a bill of sale was executed for "A music collection weighing about seventeen (17) tons, containing sheet music, bound volumes of music, and miscellaneous music, records and material; most of the foregoing music, records and material bears printing dates indicating it was printed or compiled prior to 1922; with minor exception the foregoing music, records and material is [sic] now stored in the Grand Trunk Train Depot, at Swartz Creek, Michigan."[17] The bill of sale also indicates that Corning paid $5,000.00 for the collection.

Through his exchanges with Levy, Corning became increasingly interested in the so–called "Wolfe era" materials his collection contained. Levy encouraged this interest, first in a letter of 14 October 1966:

> I understand from Harry Dichter that you have found an enormous number of items from the Wolfe bibliography. I would guess that you have twice as many as anybody else now.[18]

Corning appears to have responded with a letter he did not copy, for thirteen days later Levy wrote again saying:

> When you write that you have about 3,000 items in Wolfe's bibliography, I can just repeat what I said in my last letter when I assumed that you had twice as many as anyone else. Your letter justified my statement, because I thought I had the most and mine come to 1,500.[19]

By the close of the year, however, Corning seems to have lost much of his initial enthusiasm for these items, telling Levy:

> I have decided to sell some Wolfe material. It is my intent to keep a few hundred for period representation in my personal collection.[20]

It appears that Corning did sell portions of his collection. He also traded duplicates with Levy and other collectors, and he made an outright gift of 35,000 nineteenth–century imprints to the William L. Clements Library of Americana at the University of Michigan.[21] As a result, some items originally owned by Edison are now dispersed among various collections across Michigan and in other states. Nevertheless, Corning retained the bulk of the materials, leaving him a collection of American sheet music that extended from the 1790s into the 1920s. For most of the next two decades he experimented with various organizing schemes, none of which was truly successful. Debilitated by the effects of heart disease in his last years, Corning decided to sell the remainder of his collection in 1987. For nearly three years the School of Music at the University of Michigan sought grants from various institutions to raise the necessary capital, but was unsuccessful in its efforts. Finally an anonymous benefactor provided the School with funds sufficient to meet Corning's price and the collection was moved to the University's Buhr Storage Facility in the opening months of 1990, where it has remained in an inaccessible state awaiting organization.

The remainder of this essay reports outcomes of some initial stages of processing the pre–1860 portion of what is now formally called the Thomas A. Edison Collection of American Sheet Music. One aspect of this processing was to compare all eighteenth– and early nineteenth–century imprints to Sonneck–Upton and to Wolfe, respectively.

As a result of Corning's sales and gifts, the Edison Collection's holdings in eighteenth–century imprints are now quite modest. Only eighteen items listed in Sonneck–Upton are owned. One additional imprint, not listed in either Sonneck–Upton or in Wolfe's appendix of previously unrecorded eighteenth–century imprints,[22] is owned and will be described subsequently.

Holdings in imprints from the first quarter of the nineteenth century are substantial. Despite Corning's statement to Levy that he would retain only "a few hundred" of the items in Wolfe, the collection contains 1,392 of the titles listed in that bibliography. Of these titles 210 are in multiple copies, yielding an additional 316 items and bringing the total to 1,708 individual pieces of sheet music. There are also sixty–seven imprints unrecorded by Wolfe, eight of which are in multiple copies, bringing the grand total to 1,784 pieces of sheet music from this era.

Wolfe found it necessary to update Sonneck–Upton as a result of his discoveries. As mentioned above, he did this by including an appendix to his bibliography that lists eighteenth–century imprints unrecorded by Sonneck–Upton. In the same spirit, and following Wolfe's diplomatic protocols, this essay concludes with three sections that comprise the addenda to Sonneck–Upton and to Wolfe alluded to in its title.

The first section describes the single unrecorded eighteenth–century imprint added to Sonneck–Upton. The second section describes eighteen early nineteenth–century imprints unlocated by Wolfe but listed by him on the basis of literary evidence, such as publishers' catalogs and periodical advertisements. These citations are arranged by, and include, the entry numbers Wolfe assigned to them.

The third section describes sixty–seven imprints unrecorded by Wolfe. Inclusion of items in this category has been approached with caution. It is possible that more imprints in the Edison Collection could be listed in this section, but they were ultimately rejected for lack of corroborating evidence in Wolfe. The directory by Virginia Larkin Redway (hereafter Redway)[23] and also that by Harry Dichter and Elliott Shapiro (hereafter Dichter and Shapiro)[24] proved invaluable in this endeavor and relevant information from these sources appears in the annotations below. This section follows the alphabetical arrangement by main entry employed in Wolfe and assigns sequential numbers to the citations.
