Introduction

The General Education Board

The General Education Board, endowed by gifts from John D. Rockefeller (1839–1937), the founder of the Standard Oil Company, was organized largely by Frederick T. Gates, Rockefeller's philanthropic adviser, and his son, John D. Rockefeller, Jr. Chartered by an act of Congress in 1903, the General Education Board (GEB) had as its purpose "the promotion of education within the United States without distinction of race, sex or creed." Rockefeller's gifts to the GEB began with $1 million in 1902, followed by $10 million in 1905, $32 million in 1907, and another $10 million in 1909. Eventually he gave the GEB a total of $129 million, which, through investments, provided the Board with $324.6 million to spend on education before it ceased its operations in 1964.

The GEB continued and expanded along nondenominational lines two trends that were already part of Rockefeller philanthropy. Since the early 1880s, John D. Rockefeller had been making increasingly large donations to the American Baptist Home Mission Society (ABHMS) to support its missionary work and to build churches and schools for the denomination. With the formation of the American Baptist Education Society (ABES) in 1888 to examine the issue of whether and where to establish a great Baptist university and to foster financial support more systematically for fledgling Baptist colleges, Rockefeller became even further involved in the development of institutions of higher education.

As the head of the ABES, the Rev. Frederick T. Gates guided Rockefeller through the intricacies of university development at the University of Chicago and smaller colleges throughout the Midwest and the South, while the Rev. Henry L. Morehouse at the ABHMS persuaded Rockefeller to support denominational schools serving the needs of African-Americans and Native Americans. The result was increasing charitable demands upon Rockefeller's growing fortune; a deeper involvement of Rockefeller and his advisers in the details of building, operating, and financing specific colleges and universities; a growing sense of how great the needs were of educational institutions in different parts of the country; and, at least for Gates, whom Rockefeller hired away from the ABES in 1893 to become his philanthropic adviser, an uneasy sense that Baptist institutions were not always the most worthy of support.

As Rockefeller and Gates became more deeply immersed in educational matters, John D. Rockefeller, Jr. (JDR Jr.) joined his father's office in 1897 as a recent graduate of Brown University. In 1901, JDR Jr. took part in one of Robert C. Ogden's train trips through the South to call attention to the educational needs of African Americans. The interest of Rockefeller philanthropy in African-American welfare and education was already well established: the family was providing support to such schools as Spelman Seminary, a college for black women whose single-sex status had been preserved by a Rockefeller gift, prompting the founders to rename it in honor of Rockefeller's abolitionist in-laws. But the Ogden train trip held double significance for the future of the GEB: it introduced JDR Jr. to other Northern philanthropists interested in the South and in black education, and they heard a significant warning about race relations and the politics of education from a Southern college president. Henry St. George Tucker of Washington and Lee University in Virginia cautioned the philanthropists against providing for black southerners and ignoring the educational needs of the white South, for doing so would arouse suspicions and hatreds that would undermine their best efforts. "You must lift up the 'poor white' and the Negro together if you would approach success," he said.

Taking this warning to heart, Gates and JDR Jr. abandoned plans for a Negro Education Board and, along with other Northern philanthropists interested in the South, such as William H. Baldwin, Jr. (chairman of the GEB, 1902–1905) and Robert C. Ogden (GEB chairman, 1905–1907), developed the plans that made the GEB perhaps the most important philanthropic foundation working in the field of education in the United States during the first half of the twentieth century.

Throughout its formative years the Board was under the immediate direction of Wallace Buttrick, who, like Gates, was a former Baptist minister who had gained his experience in institution building with the ABES and the ABHMS. Buttrick served the GEB as secretary and executive officer, 1902–1917, president, 1917–1923, and chairman, 1923–1926. The Board was active on a variety of fronts under his leadership during these early years. In 1905 it launched a campaign to promote the development of public high schools throughout the South. To do so, it funded professorships in secondary education in the state universities and assigned these state agents the task of helping localities plan and organize modern high schools. The Board and its local agents also worked to strengthen the powers and finances of state agencies responsible for public education, supporting surveys and studies of educational needs to raise public awareness and foster support for both new public policies and legislation. The Board also collaborated with the U.S. Department of Agriculture to promote agricultural education by supporting the farm demonstration work of Seaman Knapp and extended the concept of demonstration work to home economics, thereby funding homemakers' clubs throughout the South in the 1910s.

The Board also actively supported colleges and universities in accord with the intent of Rockefeller's 1905 $10-million gift. Rockefeller stipulated that the income from this gift should be used "to promote a comprehensive system of higher education." All manner of institutions received support, from the large state universities and well-known colleges, such as the University of Alabama, Tuskegee Institute, Spelman College, the University of North Carolina, Hampton Institute, and the University of Virginia, to little-known schools such as Snow Hill Normal and Industrial Institute in Alabama, Ouachita College in Arkansas, Bessie Tift College in Georgia, and Wiley College in Texas. Some schools received large gifts toward their endowments, while others received smaller grants for specific purposes, which ranged from purchasing materials for the library to constructing new buildings. Files in the GEB archives pertaining to particular schools typically contain requests for support from the GEB, reports and additional material submitted in support of grant proposals, and correspondence from Board officials detailing what financial support, if any, was forthcoming.

The GEB, like any other agency working in the South during the first half of the twentieth century, came face to face with Jim Crow and public officials' efforts to impede the education of African Americans. Officials of the GEB accepted the reality of racial segregation and the necessity of working within a segregated society, but they nevertheless sought to expand educational opportunities for blacks in the South by supporting the construction of segregated public high schools; providing funds for colleges and universities serving the African-American community; and, beginning in the 1920s, by granting fellowships that enabled more than nine hundred African-American men and women to pursue graduate and professional degrees. By the time it ceased its operations in 1964, the GEB had provided more than $62 million toward African-American education. Yet, beginning with W. E. B. Du Bois's criticism of the Board's emphasis on vocational training for blacks rather than on liberal education, scholars have debated the relative merits of the GEB's work in black education.

Organization of the General Education Board Archives

The archives of the GEB at the Rockefeller Archive Center in North Tarrytown, New York, are organized into twelve series. The largest of these, Series I: Appropriations, contains 722 boxes of material and is divided into five subseries:

- Subseries 1: The Early Southern Program (boxes 1–193)
- Subseries 2: Secondary and Higher Education (boxes 194–362)
- Subseries 3: Southern Secondary and Elementary Education, 1931–1961 (boxes 363–587)
- Subseries 4: Northern and Western Programs, 1905–1961 (boxes 588–694)
- Subseries 5: Medical Education, 1905–1961 (boxes 695–722)

The additional series in the GEB archives are:

- Series II: Finance Offices (85 boxes)

Photographs in the GEB archives have been removed to a separate photograph collection at the Archive Center, photograph collection #1054, which contains approximately 1,283 items arranged in a manner that corresponds to the manuscript collection.

Related collections at the Rockefeller Archive Center include the Rockefeller Family Archives, especially the John D. Rockefeller Papers for earlier material on some of the institutions mentioned in the GEB archives; the Educational Interests series in Record Group 2, Office of the Messrs. Rockefeller Files (OMR), for additional family support of institutions mentioned in the GEB archives; and the GEB files in the Rockefeller Boards series of Record Group 2, OMR, for additional material on the organization and administration of the Board.

Subseries 1: The Early Southern Program

The records presented in this microfilm collection constitute Series I: Appropriations; Subseries 1: The Early Southern Program of the General Education Board Archives (boxes 1–193). These records document the original interest of the Board in developing a comprehensive system of education in the United States, beginning in the South, where educational systems were the least developed. This subseries includes files on 262 high schools, colleges, and universities in eighteen states and the District of Columbia. The records pertain to grants to schools and colleges for building and endowment, teacher training, certification, and salaries, and include internal GEB memorandums, reports, budgets and financial data submitted by the institutions, and correspondence between state and school officials and GEB personnel concerning such topics as school planning and design, educational statistics and local surveys, educational administration, curriculum studies and development, the special problems of rural education, and educational conditions and opportunities for African Americans.

The microfilm collection was filmed in its entirety, following the existing alphabetical-by-state arrangement of the original materials. Within each state the collection is divided into files pertaining to individual educational institutions (these are not arranged in strict alphabetical order). Many of the states also contain related subject files, including those entitled "Teacher Training Study," or "Elementary School Curriculum Study." The following list of roll contents contains brief but helpful descriptions of the individual files.

The Rockefeller Archive Center

The Rockefeller Archive Center was organized in 1974 as a division of The Rockefeller University, a biomedical research institute established by John D. Rockefeller in 1901. The Archive Center was created by the University, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, and members of the Rockefeller family. By 1970 the Rockefeller family (1954), the Rockefeller Foundation (1967), and the University (1969) had established archival programs, and between 1965 and 1973 these three organizations, joined by the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, explored the possibility of creating a single scholarly research center to house their archival records and make them available to researchers. In the early 1970s these organizations agreed to place their collections in a new archival facility to be constructed at Hillcrest, the home of Martha Baird Rockefeller, who died in 1971.

The Archive Center opened to researchers in August 1975. Since then, more than two thousand researchers have passed through the reading room of the Center, and the bibliography of dissertations, books, and articles written by these scholars contains more than 550 entries. Until the mid-1980s the Center's collection policy focused on the Rockefeller family, their philanthropic endeavors, and the papers of individuals associated with the family. In 1986, however, the Center broadened its focus to philanthropy in general and accepted the records of two foundations not organized or led by Rockefellers: the Russell Sage Foundation and the Commonwealth Fund. Since then it has accepted additional non-Rockefeller records, including the records of the John and Mary R. Markle Foundation and the Charles E. Culpeper Foundation.

To obtain additional information about the Center's programs, policies, and holdings, write to the Director of the Rockefeller Archive Center, 15 Dayton Avenue, North Tarrytown, NY 10591, or call the Center at (914) 631-4505.
