The Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, 1940-1942	1

COLLECTION OVERVIEW

The Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies (CDAAA) was an activist organization formed in May 1940 to persuade the American public that the United States should supply the Allies with as much material and financial aid as possible in order to keep the U.S. out of the war. CDAAA adopted several concrete goals: the sale of destroyers to Great Britain; the release by the U.S. government of Flying Fortresses, pursuit planes, and mosquito boats to Great Britain; the passage of the Lend-Lease Bill in Congress; the use of convoys to safely escort Allied supplies; and the revision of the 1935 Neutrality Act to arm U.S. ships for defense against Axis attacks. Through its national headquarters and state and local chapters in every state, and a huge grass-roots membership, CDAAA was able to promote its agenda.

The wealth of CDAAA's publications shed light on political attitudes of the time. Publications include flyers, pamphlets, cartoons, newsletters, newspaper advertisements and clippings, postcards, press releases, a syndicated column called "It Makes Sense", radio transcripts, speeches, petitions, and policy statements. The Subject Files document the many organizations with which the Committee was sympathetic, as well as the many isolationist organizations to which the Committee was opposed.

With the bombing of Pearl Harbor, CDAAA acknowledged that its work had come to an end, and in January, 1942, it merged with the Council for Democracy to form Citizens for Victory To Win the War, To Win the Peace.

Not available in any other library, this collection provides scholars with insight into grass-roots anti-isolationist activities before U.S. entry into the Second World War. It will be of interest to researchers in American history, European history, war and conflict studies, public policy studies, military history, and social and cultural history of the prewar and early war years.

INTRODUCTION TO THE COLLECTION

Brief Overview of American Involvement in the Early Years of World War II, 1939-1941

On September 1, 1939, Germany invaded Poland, thereby initiating World War II. Within two days, Britain and France responded by declaring war on Hitler's government. The United States, its hands tied by the Neutrality Act of 1937, was forbidden to export arms and munitions to the belligerents. As Britain and France (popularly known as the Allies) controlled the seas, such legislation benefited Germany. On September 21, President Franklin D. Roosevelt called a special session of Congress to repeal the arms embargo, though he also sought a ban on ships entering combat areas. Under the proposed "cash-and-carry" bill, belligerents had to pay for American arms in cash and transport them in their own ships. Opinion polls showed a clear majority for the bill. The Senate approved its passage by a vote of 63-30, and the House of Representatives by a vote of 243-81. On November 4, the bill became law.

The repeal of the embargo came too late to rescue Poland, which was divided between German and Soviet occupation troops by the end of September. Similarly, Finland fell to the Russians in March 1940. With a view to Western Europe, Germany invaded Denmark and Norway in April, and the Low Countries and France in May. On May 16, Roosevelt sought $1.182 billion for defense, then requested an additional $1.2 billion on May 31. Congress willingly cooperated. On June 3, the War Department released surplus arms, munitions, and aircraft in response to British prime minister Winston Churchill's request for U.S. military supplies. On June 20, Roosevelt announced that the War Department would be headed by Henry L. Stimson, an ardent interventionist Republican who had previously been both secretary of war and secretary of state. Similarly, Colonel Frank Knox--a Chicago publisher and the Republican vice-presidential candidate in 1936--was to be secretary of the navy. The Senate confirmed both appointments.

In the summer of 1940, the United States undertook several major measures. On August 18, Roosevelt and the prime minister of Canada, William Lyon MacKenzie King, met in Ogdensburg, New York to establish the Permanent Joint Board on Defense. On September 2, Secretary of State Cordell Hull and British ambassador Lord Lothian signed papers to transfer fifty World War I destroyers to Britain. In order to avoid a bitter congressional debate, the president arranged for the transfer by executive order. In return, the United States acquired the right to make ninety-nine-year leases for American bases at such diverse British locales as Newfoundland, Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, and British Guiana. On September 16, the president signed a bill instituting the first peacetime draft in American history. Introduced by two staunch conservatives, Senator Edward R. Burke (Dem.-Nebraska) and Representative James S. Wadsworth (Rep.-New York.), the bill required some 16.5 million American males to register for the conscription; those inducted would serve in the armed forces for a year and then enter the reserves. Congressional support was two-to-one and public opinion polls also showed strong support for both the destroyer-bases deal and conscription. On November 5, the president easily won reelection against Republican candidate Wendell Willkie, a Wall street lawyer and utilities executive who differed little with Roosevelt on foreign policy.

By this time, Japan was making little secret of its own ambitions in Southeast Asia. On September 22, it entered into an agreement with Vichy France to erect military bases in Indochina. Five days later, representatives from Japan, Germany, and Italy met in Berlin to sign the Tripartite Pact, an agreement that provided for a ten-year military and economic alliance. Each of the signers pledged mutual assistance in the event that any of them was attacked by a party not currently engaged in the conflict--a provision obviously aimed at the United States. Within four days, Japan was among the nations subject to an American embargo on scrap iron, a material Japan needed to make munitions.

Undoubtedly, the Lend-Lease Act of 1941 sparked the most intensive debate of all; by its provisions, the United States could lend unlimited military supplies to any nation whose defense the president deemed vital to U.S. security. In the words of Newsweek magazine, Roosevelt was being given permission to lend "anything from a trench shovel to a battle ship." The bill was passed by the Senate on March 8, by a vote of 60-31, and by the House on March 11, by a tally of 317-71. The polls indicated public support for the legislation.

Throughout the spring and summer of 1941, further presidential moves swiftly followed. On April 9, Roosevelt announced an agreement with the Danish government-in-exile that gave the United States permission to occupy Greenland; on April 18, he proclaimed the establishment of a "Western Hemisphere Neutrality Patrol" in the western Atlantic, an area Germany had pronounced as a combat zone; on June 24, he ruled that the Soviet Union, which had been invaded by Germany four days earlier, qualified for lend-lease aid; on July 7, U.S. forces occupied Iceland. On July 24, Japan began its occupation of Indochina. The president immediately retaliated by freezing all Japanese credits, thereby bringing all trade to a halt and cutting Japan off from much-needed petroleum.

Less than a month later, Roosevelt and Churchill met off the coast of Newfoundland, while their respective military subordinates engaged in informal strategic planning. On August 14, the two men prepared a manifesto of broad postwar aims, later called the Atlantic Charter. The administration almost met with defeat when, on August 18, the House approved a bill extending the term of draftees from a year to eighteen months by a margin of only one vote.

In the fall of 1941, German U-boats sank several American destroyers: the Greer on September 4, the Kearny on October 17, and the Reuben James on October 30. On September 11, Roosevelt announced that U.S. naval forces would "shoot-on-sight" hostile craft and would escort British convoys three quarters of the way across the Atlantic. Within the month, the president sought modification of the Neutrality Act of 1939 in order to arm American merchantmen crossing the Atlantic and permit them to enter belligerent ports. On November 7, the Senate approved the revised act by a vote of 50-27, as did the House six days later by a vote of 212-94. Fifty-nine percent of poll respondents approved Congress's action. However, Roosevelt remained cautious after his victory, and left it to Hitler to take the initiative.

During the summer and fall of 1941, Japanese and American attitudes hardened considerably. Although Japan sent a special envoy, Kurusu Saburo, to assist Ambassador Nomura Kichisaburo, negotiations remained deadlocked. Japan's continued occupation of China remained a major sticking point. On December 7, the Japanese attacked various American and Allied bases, including those at Pearl Harbor, Manila, Hong Kong, and Malaya. A day later, the U.S. Congress declared war on Japan. On December 11, Germany and Italy declared war on the United States, thereby propelling the country into a two-front conflict.

Brief History and Description of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies

The Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies (CDAAA) emerged from a series of meetings held in New York in May 1940 by a group of prominent Americans who were alarmed by the major setbacks of the Allies in Western Europe and who sought to assist them before it was too late. According to the Committee, England and France needed five hundred American planes immediately. Seventy-two-year-old William Allen White, editor and publisher of the Emporia (Kansas) Gazette, was chosen to be chairman. A former Bull Mooser, White had endorsed the American effort in World War I and had sought U.S. participation in the League of Nations. However, he shared in the general national disillusionment of the 1930s and consequently backed the Neutrality Acts and the Ludlow War Referendum amendment. In October 1939, he had chaired the Non-Partisan Committee for Peace through the Revision of the Neutrality Law, which had disbanded once "cash-and-carry" was enacted. There was much continuity between the leadership of the recently defunct Non-Partisan Committee and the newly organized CDAAA. White chose the name of his embryonic organization, which was informally called the William Allen White Committee.

Clark Eichelberger of New York was selected as executive director, and thereby managed organizational and personnel matters. A leading internationalist, Eichelberger had held a number of administrative positions, including national director of the League of Nations Association (1934-1945); director of the American Union for Concerted Peace Efforts (1938-1940), a group seeking to revise the Neutrality Act of 1937; and director of the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace (1939-1964). The founder of the Dixie Cup firm, Hugh Moore of Easton, Pennsylvania, chaired the executive committee. Pittsburgh casket manufacturer Frederick McKee served as treasurer. The executive committee consisted of Thomas K. Finletter, a prominent Wall Street lawyer; Frank G. Boudreau of New York, a public health expert and president of the League of Nations Association; Lewis W. Douglas, president of New York's Mutual Life Insurance Company; and Anita McCormick Blaine, a Chicago philanthropist and the only executive committee member not to attend meetings.

When White announced the formation of the CDAAA to the public on May 20, 1940, it had fifty-three members, including Henry L. Stimson, Frank Knox, and Governor Herbert Lehman of New York. By the end of the month, over 350 prominent Americans had joined the Committee, including five state governors and the presidents of Harvard and Yale. On June 9, the Committee claimed 125 local chapters. As a result of an ad entitled "Stop Hitler Now!" written by playwright Robert E. Sherwood, by June 19 the Committee had received almost 2500 contributions, which totaled over $71,000. By the end of the month, the CDAAA had collected two million signatures on petitions it then sent to the White House. It boasted one hundred chapters throughout almost every state in the Union. Regional offices were established in Chicago, Chapel Hill, San Francisco, and Boston. The Chicago chapter was chaired by attorney Adlai E. Stevenson, who later became governor of Illinois and a presidential candidate.

Professional branches were established for historians, writers, artists, and scientists; college, labor, and women's divisions also emerged. Eventually, the CDAAA listed 750 local committees, and membership might have been as high as 750,000. In its eighteen months of activity, the Committee collected $556,000 from 16,000 contributors; well over half its income came from those who gave at least a hundred dollars, with possibly a third coming from those who donated at least $500.

The CDAAA's major strength lay in the Northeast. In June 1940, over half the national committee lived in this region. Almost two-thirds of the local committees lay on the eastern seaboard. The strongest support came from middle- and upper-class business, academic, and professional people; labor and farm elements had relatively little representation. Old-stock Protestant Americans of British ancestry predominated on both the national and local committees, though there were members from those ethnic groups whose homelands had been overrun by Hitler. Politically, leadership was split between moderate Republicans and Democrats. Interventionists leaning towards some form of socialism found a more congenial home in the Union for Democratic Action, founded in April 1941 by theologian Reinhold Niebuhr.

The CDAAA focused on publicizing the pro-Allied case and the need for increased aid. During its short life span, it arranged hundreds of national and local radio broadcasts that included such speakers as Eleanor Roosevelt and Elizabeth Morrow, acting president of Smith College and widow of diplomat Dwight Morrow. The Committee held literally thousands of rallies, at which massive audiences were addressed by such speakers as Rear Admiral Harold Yarnell, retired commander-in-chief of the Asiatic Fleet. It published millions of pamphlets and reprints of speeches and articles. Between June and October 1940 alone, two million copies of printed materials were distributed. Defense for America (1940), a book sponsored by the CDAAA and edited by White, proved particularly popular. In September 1940, the Committee scored a coup in successfully soliciting a cable from General Douglas MacArthur--the former Army Chief of Staff then on inactive duty--in support of sending bombers to Britain. By October, the CDAAA had established a lobby in Washington and was sponsoring French-language short-wave broadcasts.

Committee leadership centered in New York City. Eighty-nine staffers filled the entire floor of the national headquarters, located at 8 West 40th Street. At the beginning, Eichelberger and White made the fundamental policy decisions. Though White received the most publicity, historian Jane Harriet Schwar describes Eichelberger, a man of boundless energy and organizing skill, as "the central figure" (Schwar 1973, 202). White, however, was no mere front man, though he was always more cautious concerning American intervention than Eichelberger and much of the New York leadership. By July 1940, an official policy committee was added; it issued formal statements of the CDAAA's program and by March 1941, it had expanded into a national board. Much behind-the-scenes influence was exerted by Thomas Lamont, a partner of J. P. Morgan, and international lawyer Frederick Coudert.

After the fall of France, the CDAAA appeared to lack clear objectives, as the number of Allied nations dwindled. Late in May 1940, White told Roosevelt he needed "a road map," as he was "all dressed up with no place to go." On May 27, the CDAAA, prodded by its militant New York chapter, called for specific support: the release of all surplus planes to the Allies; the appropriation of $100 million for refugees; the prohibition of munitions shipments to aggressor nations; and the institution of "any other necessary measures, short of war, to assure the fullest possible support to the Allies." Roosevelt's nomination of Stimson and Knox to major defense posts met with the Committee's full approval. On July 3, after Ambassador Lothian gave White and Eichelberger a list of Britain's major needs, the CDAAA repeated its former pleas for "planes, guns, and ships," and also demanded rapid expansion of the defense program, permission for American volunteers to serve in Allied armies, and the establishment of trusteeships over French and Dutch possessions in the Western Hemisphere. In the summer of 1940, the CDAAA persuaded both major parties to endorse aid to the Allies in their platforms, though the Committee had hoped that both the Democrats and Republicans would have taken a firmer stand. Like its opponent, the America First Committee, the CDAAA took no position on the Burke-Wadsworth Conscription Bill, due in part to White's ambivalence and in part to the fear that the ensuing controversy would simply delay aid to Britain. Some individual chapters backed the proposal, including those in Washington, Boston, and New York.

On July 23, the CDAAA issued a four-point program that included ships to evacuate British children, agricultural credits to Britain, and an embargo on oil to Nationalist Spain. The leading item, however, involved the release of at least fifty over-aged destroyers to Britain--a transaction that would take place through private companies. The Committee put all its efforts into drumming up public support by sponsoring rallies, broadcasts, pamphlets, and broadsides. Eight hundred thousand pieces of literature backing the proposal were distributed. One advertisement led off with the words "Between Us and Hitler Stands the British Fleet!" The CDAAA even appointed a subcommittee of lawyers to ensure that the proposed transaction was legal. White had expected that Roosevelt would submit the matter to Congress, thus enabling the Committee to create a bipartisan foreign policy; the Kansas editor was caught short when the president acted by executive order.

Encouraged by the destroyer-bases deal, the CDAAA increased its requests. On September 12, it stated that Britain needed twenty-five Flying Fortress bombers, twenty torpedo ("mosquito") boats, and "as many pursuit planes as possible." Eventually, the list was expanded to include tanks, Lee-Enfield rifles, and the secret Norden bomb sight, as well as American loans to pay for such items.

On November 26, the CDAAA policy committee issued a new statement, declaring that the United States could not permit the defeat of Britain and its allies. Not surprisingly, it endorsed increased aid to Britain, the consequent enlargement of American production, and allowing Americans to enlist in the Canadian army. Addressing itself for the first time to the conflict in East Asia, the Committee sought all possible military and financial aid to China, an embargo on war materials to Japan, and a naval understanding with Britain on the Pacific. The more controversial statements called for "a repeal or modification of restrictive statutes which hamper this nation in its freedom of action when it would cooperate with nations defending themselves from attack by nations at war in violation of treaties with the United States."

On December 7, 1940, in response to requests for clarification from many of its chapters, the national CDAAA declared that the United States must maintain its lifeline to Britain if Britain could not maintain it itself. This was certainly a suggestion that both the Neutrality Act of 1939 and the Johnson Act of 1935 (which banned private loans to most European powers) should be repealed and that convoys should be introduced. The issue was a divisive one within the organization, which was already being prodded by other more militant groups.

This pressure was the result of the organization of a more strident group of interventionists. On June 10, some thirty prominent individuals throughout the nation had signed "A Summons to Speak Out"--a manifesto that called for an immediate declaration of war against Germany. Its signatories included Episcopal bishop Henry Hobson, cultural critic Lewis Mumford, and Louisville editor Herbert Agar. Beginning in June 1940, about twenty-eight ardent interventionists met informally at New York's Century Club--among them theologian Henry P. Van Dusen, publisher Henry Luce, and attorney and future secretary of state Dean Acheson. Although fully half of these interventionists were CDAAA members and four of them served on its national policy committee, this new body was far more outspoken in advocating involvement, even at the risk of war. For months, the unstructured gathering, which had no official name, was labeled the Century Group of the Miller Group, as Francis P. Miller, organization director of the Council on Foreign Relations, was a major force in its development. While the CDAAA concentrated on overt publicity, the Century Group, acting behind the scenes, sought to rally the Washington elite.

White felt increasingly uncomfortable with the group's militancy. In mid-August, efforts were made to establish a joint newsletter entitled The William Allen White News Service. The scheme soon broke down, for on September 4, journalist John W. Balderston issued a plea in the name of the CDAAA for increased material for the Allies, including flying fortress bombers and the secret Norden bomb sight. Though White at first endorsed the plea, he disavowed it within two days.

Similar problems came from the New York chapter, which also took more militant positions than the national CDAAA. During the election campaign of 1940, for example, the chapter fought the reelection of the impassioned anti-interventionist congressman, Hamilton Fish (Rep.- New York). White, always a loyal Republican, responded by writing Fish a public letter, saying that despite differences over "some issues," he wanted the party to be victorious in every district and every state.

Deeper differences soon came to the fore. On November 26, at a meeting in New York, the CDAAA drafted a statement that hinted at repeal of both the "cash-and-carry" Neutrality Act of 1939 and the Johnson Act of 1935. Although White had participated in the meeting, once he returned to Kansas, he developed serious misgivings. On December 23, publisher Roy Howard printed a letter from White in order to stave off a forthcoming attack on the Committee by the Scripps-Howard newspaper chain. White took as his watchword the cry "The Yanks Are Not Coming," inadvertently echoing a slogan promoted by American Communists. He also voiced opposition to the repeal of either the Neutrality Act of 1939 or the Johnson Act of 1935. When the letter was published, White immediately received embarrassing endorsements of his new position from such anti-interventionist leaders as aviator Charles A. Lindbergh. Similarly, he faced condemnation from many within his own ranks. For instance, Fiorello La Guardia, the mayor of New York, compared White to France's collaborationist ruler, Pierre Laval. On December 30, the CDAAA's executive committee and national policy committee reaffirmed the November 26 statement. The New York chapter made La Guardia its honorary chairman and the national board added to its ranks such militants as publicist Herbert Bayard Swope, draft activist Grenville Clark, and educator Frank P. Graham. On January 1, 1941, White resigned as chairman, and was soon replaced by Senator Ernest Gibson (Rep.-Vermont).

As noted by historian William M. Tuttle, Jr., White had become increasingly ineffective. He would vacillate, defer important decisions, and change his mind suddenly and arbitrarily. He sought to gloss over deep differences between committee members. White was in such poor health that he was violating doctor's orders merely by leaving Emporia. Nonetheless, at the behest of the CDAAA executive board, which feared political repercussions, White was convinced to become honorary chairman. Lewis Douglas headed the policy committee. In May 1941, Gibson, an army reserve officer, was called to active duty; Eichelberger became acting chairman, assuming the full title in October. When Finletter stepped down from the executive committee in February 1941 to join the State Department, he was replaced by sugar manufacturer Ellsworth Bunker.

In April 1941, the Century Group formally took the name Fight for Freedom Committee (FFF), which both cooperated and competed with the CDAAA, though it never achieved equal influence. In June, the New York City chapters of the two groups fused under the title the New York Fight for Freedom Committee to Defend America. Although similar mergers took place only in Denver and New Orleans, in all these instances, the more militant FFF set the tone.

The reorganized CDAAA never regained its former influence, though it remained active in promoting administration policy. During the battle over lend-lease, it fought hard for the bill. "Deliver the goods to Britain now," the CDAAA demanded in mid-March, 1941. In May, the Committee, following the lead of the FFF, advocated the repair of British warships in U.S. shipyards, a total embargo on Japan, and most important of all, the convoying of lend-lease shipments to Britain. In July, it backed aid to Russia and the "clearing" of the Atlantic by the U.S. Navy.

The Washington Office Information Bulletin, edited by Livingstone Hartley, a former State Department official, and Frank S. Goodwin, took certain policy stands. In April 1941, it sought American occupation of Cape Verde, Madeira, and the Canary Islands and hinted at the United States taking over Singapore. In July, it backed the occupation of Iceland. A month later, the publication called for the stationing of U.S. fighter planes in Siberia and the Bering Sea in order to protect Alaska, and the following month, it endorsed Roosevelt's "shoot-on-sight" orders. In October, it justified the action of the U.S. destroyer Greer, which had been spotting a German submarine for the British. The bulletin also backed Roosevelt's request to arm merchant ships.

By the fall of 1941, the CDAAA and the FFF possessed almost identical campaigns and policies, differing only in aggressiveness and timing. When Roosevelt gave his "shoot-on-sight" speech of September 6, Eichelberger claimed the United States was "diplomatically, industrially, and now on the sea at war." Ten days later, the CDAAA practically urged an undeclared war against Germany, endorsing such moves as breaking diplomatic relations, convoying to British ports, securing Atlantic islands and African bases, and recognizing the Free French. It also wanted the United States to increase aid to China, maintain the embargo against Japan, and use its armed might to prevent the fall of Singapore, the Dutch East Indies, or Thailand. The United States, the Committee insisted, must participate in a postwar peacekeeping organization.

Once the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor, both groups formally disbanded. At the same time, the CDAAA joined with the Council for Democracy to form a far lesser-known body, Citizens for Victory, which helped form Americans United for World Organization in 1944.

Significance of the CDAAA

The CDAAA continually boasted of its effectiveness. On June 3, 1940, upon learning that two hundred American planes were being sent to Britain, White wrote, "Washington is feeling the impulse of our work." Similarly, the CDAAA was most pleased when Roosevelt, in his famous Charlottesville address of June 10, declared that the United States would "extend to the opponents of force the material resources of this nation." Throughout 1940, the Committee had ready access to President Roosevelt, major cabinet members, and numerous lower officials. Said White, "I never did anything the President didn't ask for, and I always conferred with him on our program." Although it never engaged in a major campaign without the blessing of the administration, the CDAAA always maintained its independence. After April 1941, the FFF, whose leaders were more liberal on domestic policy, gained greater influence. That April, the White House asked both the CDAAA and the FFF to tone down their demands for convoys because of congressional opposition.

Several scholars attest to the influence of the CDAAA. Noting that a Fortune poll of July 1940 showed that 67.5 percent of the population favored aid to the Allies, Walter Johnson attributes some of the credit to the Committee (Johnson 1944, 94). In discussing the destroyer-bases deal, Harriet Schwar claims that the CDAAA and the Century Group both had "a significant impact on the Administration" (Schwar 1973, 305). However, she concludes that Britain's resistance to the German blitz had a greater impact on public opinion than did either organization. As far as general impact goes, Schwar writes that all such organizations "never forced Roosevelt to take any action he did not want to take, but they did increase his freedom of action by assuring him of vocal support and providing a counterweight to his opponents." In terms of influencing public opinion, such organizations helped to determine specific issues of debate, such as the embargo against Japan and the destroyer arrangement, but on fundamental issues, they reflected national sentiment more than creating it (Schwar 1973, 311, 312).

The CDAAA also had contacts with the British. At the end of May 1940, after secret communications with the Committee, Ambassador Lothian convinced Churchill to pledge publicly that Britain would, in the prime minister's words, "fight on the beaches." The British-sponsored Inter-Allied Information Committee helped the CDAAA launch its own news service dedicated to Allied issues. In the summer of 1940, at the height of the blitz, the CDAAA supported efforts to send British children to the United States. Though at first Britain backed the proposal, it soon had second thoughts, and the CDAAA muted its support.

Importance of the Collection

In his memoirs, historian Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. writes that in a lifetime spanning eight decades, he finds no debate so impassioned as that of 1939-41 (Schlesinger 2000, 241). The CDAAA manuscripts, together with Princeton's Fight for Freedom papers, unquestionably comprise the most valuable collection of the interventionist side of the Great Debate that took place in the two years before the Pearl Harbor attack. The collection is the counterpart to that of the anti-interventionist America First Committee, located in the archives of the Hoover Institution, Stanford University. The thirty-eight manuscript boxes from the CDAAA contain national, state, and local records. One carton after another is filled with material that illuminates many aspects of Roosevelt's policies. The collection offers an invaluable record of one of the most vigorous action groups ever to appear in the United States.

For those focusing upon opinion making and economic elites, the CDAAA papers contain lists of contributors, national and local committee members, and prominent endorsers. For those curious about student activism, the collection explores the world of college and university. For those researching mass opinion making, there is extensive material on propaganda techniques. For those interested in decision making within pressure groups, the collection is replete with internal memoranda that often reveal organizational fissures. Historians of U.S. politics will appreciate the fresh material covering the destroyer-bases deal, the lend-lease bill, the use of convoys, and the 1941 revision of the 1939 neutrality action. Obviously, the collection should be of the greatest use to scholars of American foreign relations, but it will undoubtedly prove helpful to political scientists, sociologists, and specialists in the area of communications.

To offer a significant example: Boxes 7 and 8 contain much material on a host of interventionist bodies, including the Fight for Freedom Committee, United Americans, the Council for Democracy, Loyal Americans of German Descent, the American Committee for the Defense of German Homes, and the American Committee for Non-Participation in Japanese Aggression. There is also material on such anti-interventionist groups as the America First Committee and the No Foreign War Committee. Box 34 contains the issues of the national committee's newsletter, Progress Bulletin, which often contained brief descriptions of a myriad of anti-Nazi publications under the heading "Books & Nazis." The same box also has Crisis, the bimonthly bulletin of college division, which gives reports on student activity at such institutions as Cornell, Barnard, Amherst, and the University of Wisconsin. In Box 36, there are CDAAA pamphlets covering such matters as Singapore and the Azores Islands. In short, to understand interventionist ideology, the CDAAA papers are the place all scholars must begin.

ORGANIZATION OF MATERIALS

The materials were filmed as found. Files are generally organized in ascending or descending chronological order, following the organization of the collection by the Princeton archivist. When there is more than one file with the same title, the files in the microfilm edition have been numbered consecutively—e.g. Daily Reports 1, Daily Reports 2.

FORMAT

This guide lists materials in the order in which they appear on the reels. The date or dates listed on the record of each folder refer to the inclusive dates of materials that are included in the microfilm edition.

NOTICE OF UNFILMED MATERIALS

Materials excluded from this microfilm edition are noted in the entry for the file in which they are housed. These materials are available to researchers who use the collection on site at the Seeley G. Mudd Manuscript Library at Princeton University. Files excluded in their entirety are also listed in this collection guide. These files are available to researchers who use the collection on site at the Seeley G. Mudd Manuscript Library. These materials could not be microfilmed for reasons of confidentiality. In the interest of protecting the privacy of individuals, a concerted effort was made to exclude records that would violate their privacy.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The project would not have been possible without assistance from many individuals. Primary Source Microfilm wishes to thank Ben Primer, Associate University Librarian for Rare Books and Special Collections at Princeton University Library, for his commitment to making this collection widely available and his support of this project. We extend a debt of gratitude to Dan Linke, University Archivist and Curator of Public Policy Papers at the Seeley G. Mudd Manuscript Library at Princeton, for serving as project director at the Library, for his dedication to making the project run smoothly, his advice and counsel throughout the project, his unfailing good humor, responsiveness to myriad questions, and editorial skills. Special thanks go to Justus D. Doenecke, Professor Emeritus, New College of Florida, for his illuminating introduction to the collection. At PSM, Bennett Lovett-Graff was instrumental in securing Princeton as a prospective publishing partner on this and other collections. Barbara Rader first recognized the value of this collection, pursued a contract for it, and served as PSM's editorial manager of the project. Thanks to PSM's JoAnn Lebel and Myra McGettigan for overseeing the smooth manufacturing operation. PSM's editorial aides, Kimberly White, Lori-Ellen Smith, and Christine Gauvreau, meticulously reviewed all the files, prepared the materials, and helped to create the collection guide.
