THE STUDENTS FOR A DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY (SDS), a progressive, radical reformist student group, grew from the ranks of the League for Industrial Democracy (LID), whose own student group, the Student League for Industrial Democracy (SLID), had become all but defunct by the end of the 1950s. The new name was adopted formally by SLID leaders in January 1960. Under new Field Secretary Robert Alan Haber, a University of Michigan graduate student, SDS established a national office in New York and began to organize itself as a fringe political group within American academe by the end of the 1961-62 school year.

As the organization attracted new members, both Haber and subsequent Field Secretary Tom Hayden grew increasingly frustrated with the control the parent LID exerted. In particular, LID leadership insisted that SDS require a strict anti-Communist platform to ensure funding. Haber and Hayden, among others within SDS, believed that the organization should be more open-ended and include anyone, of any political persuasion, who was interested in reviving the ideals of participatory democracy both within the universities and the larger American society. The leaders began to draft proposals for the reorganization of SDS on its own terms.

At its 1962 national convention in Port Huron, Michigan, SDS drafted what came to be known as The Port Huron Statement, which served the twin purposes of creating a new manifesto and for estranging the parent LID. Written primarily by Haber, The Port Huron Statement defined SDS as an association of young people on the left. It seeks to create a sustained community of educational and political concern: one bringing together liberals and radicals, activists and scholars, students and faculty. It maintains a vision of a democratic society, where at all levels the people have control of the decisions which affect them and the resources on which they are dependent.

The Port Huron meeting also scrapped the former LID rule excluding Communists, and took the United States to task for its involvement in and, in the SDS view, unnecessary protraction of the Cold War.

Espousing a platform of academic reform, SDS was strongly against "university complicity" with the U.S. government via open recruiting on campus by government agencies and weapons manufacturers. SDS promoted civil rights activism and a forceful and disobedient opposition to the Vietnam War, and took universities to task for investing in South Africa. The group grew from 200 members in 1960 to 2,000 members in seventy loosely organized chapters throughout the country in 1965. By 1966, SDS swelled to 5,000 members and was actively demonstrating on college campuses.

SDS had been monitored by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) as early as 1962, but SDS involvement in the April 1965 Student March on Washington against the Vietnam War caught the Johnson administration off guard, and the order to monitor SDS activities followed swiftly. The Bureau investigation centered in Chicago, where SDS had established its national office on 1103 E. 63rd Street, in the heart of the ghetto. Bureau attempts to gain information included, but by no means were limited to, requests of university administrators to release files of known student activists to special agents, electronic surveillance, so-called "mail covers," active recruitment of campus informants, and "blind memorandums" to "friendly newspaper sources" who routinely questioned the activists' behavior, dress, sexual proclivities, and whether or not SDS was part of a larger international conspiracy (with the implication that SDS was a Communist-front organization).

That same implication ten years earlier might have had the intended effect of driving members away from SDS. Yet the FBI could find no hard evidence of outside influence or control of SDS, even though many of its leaders were espousing the radical thinking of Marx, Lenin, Stalin, Mao, Castro, and Che Guevara. Because SDS had none of the traditional hallmarks of foreign control or influence, they were classified as part of what became known as the "New Left."

SDS grew wildly as the FBI tried to sort out the group's ideology. Campus demonstrations in the 1967-68 school year rose sharply, and culminated in the campus takeover of Columbia University in April 1968 by SDS and other student groups. This action gained national attention, and spurred FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover to order a Bureau-wide campaign to disrupt and discredit the leadership of SDS: The counterintelligence program on the New Left, directed by William C. Sullivan, began in earnest.

At the SDS national convention in East Lansing, Michigan, in June 1968 two distinct groups formed within SDS. One, known as the "praxis axis," was attempting to formulate a radical SDS ideology, which members had to follow to belong; the other, known as the "action faction," believed that the time for SDS to demonstrate forcefully and violently had come, and that theory would have to wait. For the "action faction," nothing short of the active overthrow of the Establishment was warranted.

The defining moment of SDS occurred during the 1968 Democratic national convention in Chicago. If there were any students left who hoped that the modern American political process would save itself, they were thoroughly disillusioned by the time Senator Hubert Humphrey was given the party's nomination. After the assassination of Senator Robert F. Kennedy and Senator Eugene McCarthy's loss to Humphrey, no national candidate who appealed to the large student antiwar movement remained to run for president. Angered by the political process and subjected to the brutal, nationally televised tactics of the Chicago police department, riots in the streets of Chicago ensued.

One year later in Chicago, the SDS national convention was the forum for the breakup of the powerful organization, which had grown to an estimated 80,000 members by the end of 1968. In the June 18, 1969, issue of the SDS's New Left Notes, the "action faction," led by Bernadine Dohrn, set forth its position in an article entitled, "You Don't Need a Weatherman to Know Which Way the Wind Blows," which maintained, as Castro had said, that it was the duty of revolutionaries to make revolution. They were opposed by the "praxis axis," which at that time controlled the national office and was led by Michael Klonsky, and believed that revolution, though desirable, was not possible at the time, and that the emphasis of SDS should be on organizing and political consciousness-raising. Another faction known as the Worker-Student Alliance (which was part of the Maoist Progressive Labor Party) advocated a broad-based class struggle. At the convention, both Klonsky's and Dohrn's groups joined to oust the WSA/PLP faction. In the subsequent election, however, Dohrn and the "action faction" gained the leadership of SDS. Klonsky and the "praxis axis" then walked out of the convention and formed the Revolutionary Youth Movement II. SDS would never be the same.

The various factions did come together under the banner of SDS in the summer and fall of 1969, most notably during the October "Days of Rage" riots in Chicago. Opposition to the Vietnam War and societal reform were not in question, but the ways and means to achieve those ends were. Dohrn's group, which was calling itself the Weathermen (later known as the Weather Underground), captured the interest of the FBI when many of them did not show up for their trials after being arrested for rioting in Chicago. The Weathermen formally closed the SDS national office in February 1970, and many of its leaders went underground by the end of the month to begin a campaign of violent disruption and overthrow of the U.S. government. Although a few symbolic bombings, particularly of police property, had occurred in the fall of 1969, a more serious wave of bombings began upon the announcement of underground status. Targets included the headquarters of the New York City police department, the Bank of America Building in New York, the ITT Building in New York, the Haymarket Police Statue in Chicago (in 1969 and 1970), and the U.S. Capitol. Three Weathermen activists were killed in March 1970 when their "bomb factory" in New York's Greenwich Village accidentally exploded. The Weathermen bombing movement became more sporadic as the 1970s progressed; the last major target was the State Department in 1975. The FBI finally penetrated a Weathermen "cell" in Los Angeles in 1977, which ended any effective Weathermen resistance. Other activists gradually surfaced after years of fugitive status.

Political fallout from the investigation of SDS and the Weathermen came one year later, when then-Acting Director L. Patrick Gray, Acting Associate Director W. Mark Felt, and Assistant Director Edward S. Miller were indicted for authorizing burglaries by Bureau personnel of Weather Underground associates and relatives after J. Edgar Hoover's death in May 1972. Hoover, who had sensed the political mood of the country and distrusted Nixon administration officials, had curtailed such operations against the New Left activists for fear of exposure of the FBI, despite mounting political pressure prior to his death to crush the antiwar movement. Hoover purged COINTELPRO masterminds William C. Sullivan and Charles D. Brennan in 1971 for their attempts to expand government surveillance without his approval.

The FBI File on SDS and the Weathermen spans the years from 1962 to 1977, and is divided into seventy-five sections arranged in rough chronological order. The file also includes a section entitled "June Mail," which deals with electronic and telephone surveillance of SDS by the FBI from as early as 1965, and a 400-page August 1976 report entitled "Foreign Influence — Weather Underground." The types of documents included are Bureau memorandums, teletypes, airtels, and newspaper clippings. A good selection of SDS-produced materials, including copies of New Left Notes, and the Weather Underground magazine Osawatomie, is also included.

The documents reproduced here were drawn from the Washington files of the FBI and have been released under the Freedom of Information Act; certain documents or portions of documents have been deleted by the FBI pursuant to provisions of that legislation. The material has been filmed in the exact order and condition in which it was released.

The roll notes that follow this introduction do not provide a complete inventory of the file; however, they give an indication of the types of materials available for research. They are listed using the following format: Type of document, date of document, sender and recipient (where applicable), and what the document concerns.
