PREFACE

The North American Congress on Latin America (NACLA) was founded in response to the April 1965 U.S. invasion of the Dominican Republic. This armed intervention by the United States against a popular uprising—classic gunboat diplomacy—preempted the restoration to power of freely elected president Juan Bosch. It also paved the way for the thirty-year dictatorship of caudillo Joaquín Balaguer. NACLA's founders were especially struck by the Johnson administration's ability to disseminate its version of events virtually unchallenged, while mainstream opinion makers set the tone of a limited public debate. Moreover, as the U.S. intervention in Vietnam began in earnest, progressive critics and opponents of U.S. policy, both abroad and at home, began seriously to consider questions about the nature of public education, the role of independent media, and how to make critical analysis of the U.S. power structure accessible to a broad and interested public.

NACLA, which took shape from these questions, was founded in October and November of 1966 in a series of meetings of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the University Christian Movement, and returned Peace Corps volunteers, along with assorted other individuals and organizations. According to its articles of incorporation, NACLA's role was "to encourage, produce and distribute information designed to identify and explain those elements and relationships of forces in the United States and Latin America which inhibit and frustrate urgently needed profound social and economic change." The "congress" in NACLA's name was suggested by the "Congress of Unrepresented People," a contemporary group of civil rights, antiwar, and labor activists who came together to challenge elite conceptions of the national interest as fundamentally opposed to the real interests of the majority of the American people.

Thus NACLA was mandated to provide accurate and comprehensive information and analysis to a broadly conceived progressive movement in order to enable that movement to effectively question and challenge the government's self-serving arguments. In keeping with these concerns, the new collective published an eight-page mimeographed newsletter in February 1967, the first issue of the NACLA Newsletter. The newsletter rapidly evolved into the Latin America and Empire Report and ultimately into the Report on the Americas with its in-depth focus on single themes concerning the impact of U.S. policy and institutions on political, social, economic, and cultural developments in the region.* Deliberately avoiding the turgid and tendentious left discourse then in vogue, NACLA researchers sought to produce reports that provided a concrete, factual basis for the formulation of alternative policy proposals.

During the past thirty years NACLA has undergone at least three generational changes, weathering intense political debates and relentless financial pressures. It has also persevered through the rising and falling fortunes of the political left, both in the U.S. and in Latin America. In the first phase of its existence NACLA produced ground-breaking reports exposing both the practices of U.S.-based multinational corporations and the impact of U.S. government agencies and policies in the region. NACLA provided detailed studies of USAID, the CIA, AIFLD, and the Pentagon, among others, and their implementation of U.S. policy. In this incarnation NACLA also produced a number of important "how to" pamphlets such as Who Rules Columbia?, The Research Methodology Guide, and The University-Military-Police Complex, all of which set new standards for investigative research into the activities of state and private sector institutions and served as templates for exposés by other organizations.

*Jane Rothenberg, to whom this work is dedicated, made a vital contribution—as writer, editor and fundraiser—to many of NACLA's hard-hitting reports during the organization's first ten years. Jane was on staff from 1972-77, during virtually the entire run of NACLA's Latin America & Empire Report. Her obituary appears in Volume XI, Number 6, September/October 1977, the first issue of NACLA's newly reformatted Report on the Americas.

The second phase of NACLA's existence, marked by the election of the Popular Unity government in Chile, refocused NACLA's attention from the exploration of the mechanisms of imperialism in general to the impact of U.S. policy in specific countries. After the overthrow of Allende's government in 1973, this new approach was reinforced by the destructive spread of political repression and military coups throughout the entire region. Accompanying NACLA's more country-specific orientation was an increased attention to the impact of U.S. government policies applied here at home as NACLA conducted studies centered on both specific industries and the popular/labor movements in the United States.

The third era corresponded to the rise of a revolutionary tide in Central America, which reoriented NACLA's work toward events in Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Guatemala. More than ever before NACLA devoted its energies to the analysis of parties and movements in struggle as much as to the regional activities of the U.S. government. NACLA also became more tightly linked to a burgeoning solidarity movement (as occurred in the aftermath of the Chilean coup), sending influential fact-finding and educational tours to the region, while providing other organizations with the information they needed for their own solidarity work. During the 1980s NACLA staff members were frequently sought out as public speakers and media sources, attracting, at the same time, some less welcome attention from the minions of the "national security state."

Most of the materials contained in this NACLA Archive of Latin Americana were collected during the first twenty years of NACLA's history (1966-1986). The special reports, newsletters, and eventually, magazines appearing under the NACLA imprint were the outcome of research and writing done by members of the collective. The materials that they amassed in their files ranged from newspaper clippings to original government documents to revolutionary communiques to corporate proxies. As NACLA established fraternal links with publications, political parties, and nongovernmental organizations across the region, it also acquired a substantial and varied collection of periodical publications, many of which can now be found only in this collection. This microfilmed archive is, therefore, the product of a very special set of historical and institutional circumstances that made NACLA's work an important tool and component in the creation of an entire movement.

Over time, changes in NACLA's staffing and approach to publishing the magazine—not to mention structural transformations in the region—have made it unlikely that this archive could be replicated or even substantially supplemented in the future. While NACLA initially developed into a small progressive think tank with a reputation for investigative journalism and top-notch policy analysis, it has gradually shifted away from in-house research to commissioning and publishing original outside work in its Reports. Financial pressures in part have dictated this evolution, but changes in the scholarly and journalistic community—to which NACLA itself contributed—also played a role. It was no longer essential or affordable to maintain a team of top-flight researchers while the ranks of the Latin American Studies Association were filling up with leading critical scholars. Another phenomenon, also part of NACLA's legacy, was the development of closer ties between Latin American and Caribbean scholars and journalists and their counterparts in North America.

The NACLA model that evolved in the late 1980s involved downsizing to a core editorial and administrative staff that assumed responsibility for framing the issues, assigning and coordinating research, editing the final product, and finally publishing and distributing the Reports. Using an impressive network of contacts and correspondents, NACLA staff have generally been able to identify individuals and institutions involved in current cutting-edge research and analysis, all over the Americas, whatever the issue. To broaden its reach and more effectively utilize its human resources, NACLA also institutionalized its editorial board into a genuinely expert, participatory, and consultative body involved in the planning and assigning of research.

More than thirty years later, NACLA is still here—albeit in a leaner and meaner incarnation—and still committed to the mission set forth by its founders: uncovering the truth about the impact of American institutions on the peoples of the region and educating the widest possible audience about the nature of the processes at work. Having widened its mission, NACLA tries increasingly to depict and analyze the rapidly evolving political, social, and cultural reality of Latin America, and to present those findings to an ever more diverse North American public interested in the fate of progressive issues and forces across the region.

What has NACLA achieved in its first three decades? Overall, the question of NACLA's impact is best answered by considering its reputation in Latin America. It comes perhaps as no surprise that NACLA is a welcome guest of revolutionaries in Cuba, or that Sandinista, FMLN, or URNG cadre are always pleased to meet with a representative of NACLA. After all, NACLA has always stood firm in its condemnation of U.S. intervention against progressive political and social movements and has made its mark through its uncompromisingly critical reporting and analysis, some of which has been directed at those very parties and movements themselves. But NACLA reaches far beyond the confines of political party and state structures. Grassroots activists and organizers from Uruguay to Honduras recognize NACLA's name and respect its contribution to their struggles. Some last saw an issue of the magazine years ago, while others, unable in any case to read an English-language publication, recall that NACLA stood against dictatorship and oppression and championed the cause of social justice during their countries' darkest hours.

From time to time we continue to be genuinely and pleasantly surprised at the extent of NACLA's impact in the region. For instance, Salvador Allende, in response to questions from the press after his historic 1973 speech before the UN, suggested that they read the NACLA Report if they wanted to learn what the U.S. was doing to destabilize his government. In response to a recent invitation to write for us, Rubén Zamora, presidential candidate for the left democratic convergence in El Salvador, and former leader of the FDR, informed us that he regards NACLA as responsible for the better part of his political formation. More recently still, President Aristide's ambassador-in-exile to the United States, Jean Casimir, wrote NACLA during the depths of the period of military rule to "express to NACLA my gratitude for its unflinching solidarity during this important period of our history."

This brief synopsis barely scratches the surface of all that NACLA has been and achieved. In the depths of the crisis of the neoliberal moment, with greater poverty and environmental degradation than ever before experienced and virtual U.S. hegemony over the region, NACLA's work is more relevant than ever. We proudly present this research archive, not as a legacy from some golden age of progressive engagement, but as a tool to learn from the experiences of the past, and to help us all continue working for a brighter future with more hope and justice than can be envisioned in these trying times.

INTRODUCTION

The NACLA Archive of Latin Americana at the New School for Social Research holds the promise of deepening our understanding of the forces that shaped Latin American political and socioeconomic life during the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s. The published and catalogued printed record from this period of military rule, dictatorships, debt crisis, and revolution all too often only suggests a much larger documentation. These lacunae reflect both the Latin American reality and the collection priorities of most research libraries. Materials such as fliers, pamphlets, posters—even newspapers and magazines—often appeared in limited quantity or experienced restricted circulation. On the other hand, broadly accessible and cheaply printed items were often judged unfit for acquisition. Nevertheless, these documents often provide the basic evidence for understanding a movement or idea, since the materials are from the organizations most directly responsible. This archive, for the first time, will make it feasible to work with nearly three decades of primary sources for many countries and from many organizations.

The NACLA Archive preserves invaluable documentation from political movements, solidarity groups, churches, and a wide range of other organizations engaged in the construction (or destruction) of social and political institutions. NACLA's foresight in conserving its vast files merits commending as much as does the commitment of the many hundreds of organizations which consistently sent their printed materials to NACLA. Many of these organizations today do not exist, their archives destroyed and their membership dispersed. The ephemeral nature of many of the publications themselves, combined with organizations' frequent indifference regarding long-term preservation of documents, resulted in libraries only infrequently building significant collections of such materials.

In addition, difficulties associated with the technical processing and preservation of such items for broad public use meant that most research libraries did not pursue comprehensive acquisition directly from the source. Since most of these imprints had limited market value, book dealers and other commercial channels did not handle their distribution. For libraries to accumulate even a small amount of material from a particular movement at a given point in time involved considerable effort. To do so for an entire country and over several decades was a near impossibility. With collecting so labor intensive, even under ideal conditions, the shifting nature of the groups represented in this archive, combined with an often total disregard for commercial distribution, meant that few libraries could make this investment. Individual researchers returning from the field might donate items acquired to a library or preserve imprints as examples of the wealth of documentation available. It should come as no surprise that many more voices existed than are represented in library card catalogs.

This archive represents a major addition to a highly uneven base of primary sources for the study of organizations involved with political and socioeconomic change in Latin America during the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s. Many well-known organizations appear, but so also do others that only subsequently gained recognition, along with others that simply disappeared. Substantial serial holdings reveal more than two hundred titles bibliographically unrecorded and many more with only partial collections within the US and Canada. The depth of the pamphlets, fliers, and reports from many groups is truly remarkable. While the NACLA Archive makes no claim to comprehensiveness for any organization, topic, or country's imprints, it becomes readily apparent that for some countries the extraordinary array of materials promises access to the ideas of groups central to some aspect of history, whether it be political, social, religious, moral, or economic. Therein lies the greatest strength of the NACLA Archive: it represents voices either muted or extinguished and permits major expression to others previously represented only by limited primary sources in research libraries. The availability of these materials for the first time will enable a rethinking of existing scholarship and permit new queries in areas where access proved highly problematic due to the absence of documentation.

Because NACLA acquired these materials for supporting its own research and as part of its publishing effort, and not with the intent to form a research library of primary sources, it is even more remarkable that such consistently high quality has been achieved in terms of substance. The most notable overall holdings occur under the categories of Central America, Chile, Cuba, El Salvador, Guatemala, Latin America, and Nicaragua. Other categories possess topical strengths. Throughout, topical depth exists for politics, socioeconomic conditions, solidarity groups, human and civil rights, and church and religion.

Scope and Content

The NACLA Archive of Latin Americana at the New School for Social Research is the largest and most extensive collection of its type. Spanning the period of the late 1950s through the early 1990s, with the greatest emphasis on 1965-1985, the archive brings together publications from and about all Latin American countries. Predominant throughout are primary sources, with secondary sources consisting mainly of research institutes' working papers and other similar types of scholarship. The original collection consisted of many thousands more documents than what became the microfilmed archive. The result of steady acquisition over several decades, the collection had by 1994 grown to include substantial holdings of serials, government documents, monographs, working papers of research institutes, fliers, and various types of materials issued by political movements, churches, solidarity groups, and a wide range of non-governmental organizations. As a collection, it presented the potential of both depth and breadth of research opportunity. To understand the ultimate composition of the microfilmed archive, an overview of its transformation from paper to microfilm is necessary.

Given the extraordinary holdings of Latin Americana within the New York metropolitan area, the costs involved to house and maintain the NACLA collection were judged too great to justify keeping it as originally organized. Created as a working collection to support the research of the NACLA staff, it consisted of vast files of clippings, government and corporate reports, and other similar publications that today are largely available electronically or already in microform. While these materials did not merit preservation and reorganization, the publications of political movements and various interest groups, along with foreign government publications often did. Because of NACLA's extensive, worldwide contacts developed and maintained over the years with many groups devoted to specific objectives for Latin America, the collection had developed a reputation of holding unique materials. Precisely because NACLA recognized the value of the record that these publications provided, a systematic effort occurred to assure their retention. Granted, military rule and censorship laws in many countries during the 1960s and 1970s made publishing a risky business. Some of the imprints appeared clandestinely, and others were issued abroad. In sum they represent the ideas and concerns of various interest groups about the conditions within a particular country. These are the materials that ultimately came to comprise the present archive.

The process of eliminating imprints held elsewhere and reorganizing materials from topical files under country headings with topical subdivisions required many hundreds of hours. Basically any newspaper with national circulation and availability on microfilm was discarded, as were national news-magazines. Any serial publication with more than three libraries reporting holdings on the national bibliographic utility (RLIN) was also discarded. The same applied to foreign government documents and monographs. In this last category the relatively few works microfilmed were not cited in RLIN. Furthermore, given the similarity of collecting coverage with the Princeton University Latin American Microfilm Collection (1), considerable effort was expended to eliminate duplication of materials already microfilmed years ago. The same applied to NACLA's Brazilian holdings: duplication with Brazil's Popular Groups, 1966-1995, a project of the Brazil office of the United States Library of Congress, was avoided as much as possible (2). Duplication with Latin American and Iberian Pamphlets, 1, 1802-1950, of the Library of Congress was judged not to be too likely (3). The Library of Congress Mexican and Central American Political and Social Ephemera, 1980-1991, proves complementary (4). Serials from Latin American churches were checked against the Princeton Theological Seminary's microfilming project for the Center for Research Library's Latin American Microform Project, and only titles not already filmed or listed as candidates for filming therein were included (5). The resulting NACLA Archive is therefore, as far as was practicable, material that either does not exist elsewhere in microformat or hard copy, or if it does, not in the depth or length of runs that NACLA offers.

Strengths of the NACLA Archive by Topical Subdivision

1. Politics

Because of NACLA's mission, strong interest existed in understanding the perspectives of the various political forces active within a country, whether they were legitimate political parties or clandestine groups operating within or outside of the country. This documentation takes many forms: traditional newspapers and magazines, publications for the party faithful, fliers, and political tracts designed to recruit membership. For some countries the coverage ranges through substantial diversity of ideological perspective, while for other countries and periods only a few parties or movements are represented. Not infrequently, however, what exists in any depth is not recorded bibliographically elsewhere in the United States or Canada. Given the circumstances of the 1960s and 1970s, under which much of this political documentation appeared, it is likely that in many countries, especially those in which military coups occurred, these materials no longer exist. In other cases, parties or movements went on to capture power, or they merged into ideologically similar organizations, or simply disappeared. In sum, the archive provides access to the historical record of political activity for a period of great ferment.

2. Government

Government materials include documentation addressing public policy, foreign relations, and legal or constitutional issues. In general, the more unusual official imprints appear, and for some countries the greatest emphasis is on foreign relations. Recognizing that these materials are often elusive due to short press runs and non-commercial distribution, considerable discretion was used in retaining materials supporting the official perspective if also related to other areas of concern within the country collection.

3. Socioeconomic Conditions

Under socioeconomic conditions one finds the work of both government and private sector organizations. Content varies widely from country to country, but overall, materials retained address economic development questions, labor, social and physical infrastructure (e.g., schools, health services, transportation systems, communications), and demographic topics. Some official publications appear in this category, but generally the imprints are from a wide array of private sector agencies and some international organizations. Little dealing with U.S. bilateral aid from a United States perspective exists because those materials are readily available as U.S. government documents. Because of NACLA's interests, the greatest overall strength is in labor.

4. Agriculture

In the broad area of agriculture, materials on peasants, rural organizations, crops and products, and investment issues constitute the bulk of the holdings. For some countries the issues surrounding agrarian reform and land tenure provoked considerable polemics from political movements and peasant leagues. Whenever these issues constituted the principal emphasis, the publications were arranged in the Agriculture category. Researchers are advised to consult the Politics section, under which these topics also appear, albeit with less systematic coverage.

5. Solidarity Groups

Solidarity groups for many countries experiencing dictatorship or revolution provided a forum for the discussion of issues either not found within the national press, or found with only limited coverage. Generally located abroad, these organizations utilized information from within the country as well as from exiles to create a broad array of publications ranging from regularly issued serials to posters and fliers announcing meetings or denouncing specific governmental acts. In this category, tracing the activities of exiles from one country but located in various hemispheres becomes possible, as does accessing the ideological strains that constituted this particular form of opposition. Materials devoted to the organizations themselves, ranging from finances to planning strategy, are found here. Whenever the group addressed a broader range of concerns, those additional materials also appear. Depending on the country and issue, a fine line may exist between solidarity, human and civil rights, and church publications—researchers, therefore, are urged to consult those sections as well. This section strongly underscores the presence of solidarity groups in many countries along with the nature of their commitment to educate and inform local citizenry about the internal conditions of other countries. Their publications often emphasize the relationship between the host national government and the corresponding Latin American state, as well as private sector engagements. This type of alternative, and often investigative, reporting may well never appear in the national press of either country.

6. Human and Civil Rights

Human and Civil Rights embraces publications from organizations exclusively charged with working in these areas, as well as materials from others that address topics concerning torture, refugees, exiles, prisoners, trials, defense, and legal issues. With rare exceptions, no imprints of the major human rights groups operating in the U.S. and the U.K. are included. The records contained in this section document not only man's inhumanity to man, but also the courage to corroborate and denounce. Extensive coverage of certain trials and investigations provides details unavailable elsewhere for those particular cases and also serves as a record of the organizational abilities, not to mention the tenacity, of those committed to the righting of wrongs. These publications provide important evidence of civil society's moral compass during military rule. Because of the often dangerous circumstances under which these groups had to operate, publications are generally ephemeral in nature and produced with limited printing and graphical sophistication. Nevertheless, for many countries long sequences of documents of particular groups' activities provide access to a record that embraces the disappeared and tortured and addresses issues concerning women, youth, governmental corruption, and the rights of indigenous peoples.

7. Racial Groups

Racial Groups contains a mix of documentation issued by people of African ancestry, indigenous peoples, and groups concerned with these people. Under the best of circumstances materials are limited because of the relative absence of effective organized groups. The materials NACLA gathered reflect these realities, and taking into consideration that the record is only a partial one, valuable insights and evidence can be drawn from this section. Of particular importance are writings that address land rights and ethnic identity issues.

8. Women and Gender Issues

Women and gender issues present themselves in the organizational phases for many countries. During the 1960s and much of the 1970s women's groups did not have the extensive assistance that emerged with the changed attitudes and circumstances of the 1980s. These groups operated with limited funding and often had their causes articulated through human rights, solidarity, or church organizations.

As an introduction to the efforts of women, the archive gives a panorama that today can be followed in greater depth due to the substantial development of such organizations.

9. Culture

The Culture section contains works of literary and artistic expression along with the papers of groups organized for such objectives. Often these materials address the popular sectors and prove valuable resources for language and graphic presentations. Themes tend toward the political and form yet another critique of national reality. Comics generally appear within this section.

10. Church and Religion

Church and Religion offers substantial coverage for many countries. Included are the activities of Catholic and Protestant groups, ranging from theology to solidarity-type organizing efforts. As a record of spiritual involvement, the archive is mixed but in many cases provides sufficient material to understand a particular church's beliefs. For documenting the involvement of ecclesiastical organizations in various aspects of Latin American life, and for those based in the U.S., the "Latin Americanization" of congregations, the archive holds superb evidence. Not only may individual denominations be traced, but ecumenical efforts as well. Of particular importance are efforts to bring the injustices common in many countries to the attention of non-Latin American congregants through speakers, films, study groups, and delegations. The extent of networks to accomplish this goal, along with the wide range of materials created to inform, suggests a depth of commitment often overlooked when assessing how non-specialists learn about Latin America.

Church-sponsored organizations produced documents explaining contemporary realities, often with the aid of their missionaries, human rights groups, and others in solidarity with the oppressed. For Catholics the wide variation in the substance of publications from country to country may well underscore the different natures of the national churches. Sufficient quantities of information exist for many countries to understand the growing involvement of Protestant churches. Church documents overall provide yet another angle to address political issues and to understand the struggles of specific sectors of the population.

11. Environment and Ecology

Environment and Ecology became topics of major concern only in the late 1980s, so the archive has a thin representation. What exists may be viewed as early efforts to underscore the destruction of natural areas, the importance for environmental planning, and the problems of pollution.

Organization

The NACLA Archive consists of country files with topical subdivisions. The RLIN cataloging number identifies the country's cataloging record. Included are:

Topical subdivisions are:

1. POLITICS
2. GOVERNMENT, CONSTITUTIONS, LAWS AND CODES
3. SOCIOECONOMIC CONDITIONS
4. AGRICULTURE
5. SOLIDARITY GROUPS
6. HUMAN AND CIVIL RIGHTS

*Includes the West Indies, English, Dutch and French-speaking territories, Belize, Surinam and French Guyana

7. RACIAL GROUPS
8. WOMEN AND GENDER ISSUES
9. CULTURE
10. CHURCH AND RELIGION
11. ENVIRONMENT AND ECOLOGY

Not all countries will have materials for each topic. Some countries by the nature of their history and NACLA's ongoing interest offer both breadth and depth of coverage. Because the microfilm archive derives from a paper one, archival organizing principles prevailed, including frame references to boxes and folders (termed "files" on the microfilm). Researchers will find a complete list of the country's content at the beginning of the first reel of the country; thereafter, each box will carry a listing of contents, and in all cases each file has an introductory frame indicating the contents. In cases of serials or corporate bodies extending for more than one file, the information specific to each file appears. Thus the researcher interested in a specific year of a serial title will consult the master list at the beginning to identify the specific box and file containing the year needed. Of course, the same is feasible throughout the printed archive guide.

Materials in each file appear in chronological order, with the oldest date first and the most recent last, followed by undated items and posters. Whenever serials exist, issues are grouped together with the first date held; an individual entry exists for serials with three or more issues. When a title appears in two or more languages, and fewer than four issues exist in the minor language, an entry occurs only for the title in the predominant language. Whenever possible, with quantity being the guideline, materials issued by the same organization are grouped together and will merit a corporate body entry, sometimes with further identification as to specific serial titles, but always with a brief description of the type or nature of publication. Serial holdings appear with inclusive dates, not with volume and issue numbers. Missing issues are not identified.

Bibliographic Access

Full bibliographic records for the NACLA Archive appear in RLIN and OCLC. Each record is for a country or region (e.g., Central America, Latin America or the Caribbean). It is expected that some libraries will acquire the entire archive, while others will opt for either countries or topics within countries. Hence, in identifying exactly what a library owns, the display of holdings is essential. Consult the guide to ensure identification and access to exactly the topics required.

Bibliographic Citation Format

This collection is bibliographically a single entity or is catalogued under separate country collections. Because of the considerable array of materials in most countries, particular care should be exercised when citing individual items. To assist with the identification and location of a citation, each microfilm frame carries a frame number thereby enabling ease in locating the item. Below are illustrations of the most commonly encountered bibliographic situations:

Acknowledgments

For many years the NACLA Archive of Latin Americana served not only the NACLA staff but also activists, scholars, and students. At a certain point in NACLA's history, maintaining the archive for the activist and scholarly communities became no longer feasible, and the materials went into storage for some years. The growing recognition of the materials' importance for many aspects of research on Latin America motivated NACLA, in partnership with The New School for Social Research (hereafter the New School), to arrange for the organization and ultimately, microfilming, of the archive, thereby ensuring both its preservation and widest possible access.

The preparation of the microfilmed Archive of Latin Americana drew upon the talents, expertise, and patience of many individuals. To better understand the scope of the project, one needs to envision more than 3,000 cubic feet of paper in the form of several hundred packing cartons and more than a hundred packed file drawers containing tens-of-thousands of pamphlets, fliers, clippings, booklets, newspapers, journal issues, and posters. Over the course of some months these items were sorted and arranged into country or regional groups, and further subdivided by topics. This work was carried out by Fabian Balardini (New School), Hortensia Calvo (Duke University), César Espejo (NACLA), Bayardo González (NACLA), Margot Olavarria (New School), Leone Campos de Sousa (New School), and Lucia Vásquez (Hunter College, City University of New York). Design and creation of the database was done by Francisco J. Fonseca (Princeton University) with editorial assistance by Tomás Galli de Amorim (Princeton University) and inputting help from Margot Olavarria and Leone Campos de Sousa.

The project is indebted to Gail Persky, University Librarian at the New School, for her unflagging support through all phases of the work, demonstration of extraordinary patience during difficulties, and willingness to bring together all the necessary forces to ensure completion. As the project manager, she worked closely with others at the New School: Judith Friedlander, Dean of the Graduate Faculty of Political and Social Science, Grace S. Fisher, Director, Development Campaign of the Graduate Faculty, A. Dan McIntyre, Associate Dean of the Graduate Faculty, and Sonia Salas, Executive Secretary, Graduate Faculty Dean's Office. The cataloging for each country was the responsibility of Sherman Clarke, Head of Cataloging, the New York University Libraries. Matthew Hershey, Acquisitions Editor at Scholarly Resources Inc., the publishers of the archive, provided his editorial and publishing expertise for the preparation of the archive's guide.

There were initial legal obstacles to overcome in the recovery of the materials, for which a debt of gratitude is owed to Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison, Attorneys at Law, for taking the case pro bono, as well as to Anthony B. Radin, the attorney of record, for concluding the matter in record time. Pierre M. LaRamée, Executive Director of NACLA, persisted in the pursuit of this hitherto long-delayed project in the face of numerous financial and logistical hurdles, including negotiating with the principal parties involved, working closely with NACLA's attorney, arranging for the transportation and storage of the materials, coordinating space and personnel during the sorting, and arranging for final filming and publication. Among NACLA's board of directors, special thanks are due to Josh Dewind for helping to facilitate the process at many critical junctures.

Students and scholars are also deeply indebted to Daniel E. Rothenberg, Trustee of The New School for Social Research for his patience, continued belief in the project, and generosity in personally funding it. His vision will enable new and exciting research on many topics essential to understanding Latin America during the period of revolution, military rule, economic change, growth of social movements, and increased involvement of churches in political and economic questions.

To all these individuals, as well as to those responsible for microfilming, I express my thanks and gratitude for the commitment to excellence and plain hard work.

and Bibliographer for Latin America, Spain and Portugal
