Introduction

The American Civil Liberties Union Archives document the activities of the Union in protecting individual rights from 1920 through 1995. The files contain materials on freedom of speech, expression, and association; due process of law; equality before the law; legal case files; and organizational records. Within these categories, files reflect subject areas such as academic freedom, censorship, racial discrimination, aliens' rights, privacy concerns, labor concerns, amnesty, and government loyalty and security. The files reflect work on litigation, advocacy and public policy, and various areas of interest connected with civil liberties. Materials include correspondence, court documents, memoranda, printed matter, minutes, reports, briefs, and legal files. Also included are materials from ACLU affiliate organizations and the Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee.

The records also document the ACLU's predecessor organization, the National Civil Liberties Bureau (1917-1920) of the American Union Against Militarism.

Size

1917-1950: 1,886 bound volumes and 12 archival boxes (on 288 reels of microfilm)

1917-1995: 899.37 linear feet (2,004 archival boxes, 20 half-size archival boxes, 21 archival shoeboxes, 20 16x20 photo boxes, 11 8x10 photo boxes, 9 film canisters, and 1 24x36 photo box)

Processed 1994-1996 by Paula Jabloner with the assistance of Assistant Archivist for Technical Services Daniel Linke, Special Collections Assistants Amy Escott, Claire Johnston, Alison McCuaig, and Tom Rosko, and students Laurie Alexander, Christina Aragon, Laura Burt, Jue Chen, Clement Doyle, Joe Faber, Said Farah, Boyd Goodson, Naomi Harlin, Janet Hine, Matthew Honahan, Katherine Johnson, Damian Long, Theresa Marchitto, Laura Myones, Olivia Kew, Grace Koo, Dan Sack, Bijan Salehizadeh, Tina Wang, Kyle Weston, and Elizabeth Williamson.

The processing was made possible by the generous support from the National Historic Publications and Records Commission and the John Foster and Janet Avery Dulles Fund.

Historical Note

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) was established in 1920 to protect the specific constitutional freedoms in the Bill of Rights. In 1915 the American Union Against Militarism (AUAM) was formed to prevent U.S. involvement in World War I, with Crystal Eastman serving as executive secretary. Roger Baldwin became executive director in 1917. Immediately upon U.S. entry in World War I, the AUAM was inundated with requests for aid to protect free speech, assembly, and press, all of which were threatened with political restriction, and to defend the rights of conscientious objectors. A separate organization was needed to safeguard these rights, and thus the National Civil Liberties Bureau (NCLB) was established in the autumn of 1917 with Roger Baldwin as director.

For the history of the ACLU during the Baldwin years, see the ACLU finding aid, 1912-1950, which may be viewed in electronic form at <http://infoshare1.princeton.edu/libraries/firestone/rbsc/>

Trials of Growth, 1950-1995

The forty years between 1950 and 1990 were a time of significant growth for the ACLU. Membership increased twenty-five times, and the Union's impact on the legal landscape was broad and deep. One historian decreed that the decade after 1954 witnessed "the greatest advances in civil liberties in American history," with significant gains for African Americans, women, students, the mentally ill, prisoners, and others previously denied the full protection afforded by the U.S. Constitution. This period also saw the end to much censorship and the decoupling of church/state activity. The ACLU's boom was not without the threat of bust, however. The organization restructured itself several times as it wrestled to reflect internally the principles that it publicly espoused. Its expansion into new areas of civil rights, along with its firm stand on the First Amendment, produced episodes that threatened the ACLU's viability.

Organizational Expansion

In the years immediately following World War II, younger, nonfounding members of the ACLU Board pressed for and eventually achieved a structural reorganization that led to the Union's present configuration. In 1950, Roger Baldwin's role changed from administrator to ambassador; he now toured, lectured, and wrote on civil liberties issues. As director of the ACLU, Baldwin preferred that the ACLU remain a small, centrally controlled unit with himself at the helm, something that changed under the administration of his successor, Patrick Murphy Malin. A Swarthmore economist, Malin lacked Baldwin's charm and speaking skills, but he was a successful administrator who oversaw the growth of the organization from 9,000 members in 1950 to over 60,000 by the time of his departure in 1962.

Much of this growth can be attributed to the expansion of local affiliates at the state and regional levels that had their own boards and acted upon local civil liberties issues. Many served as watchdogs—ensuring that civil rights victories won by the national ACLU in the high courts were enforced at the local level—while other affiliates were active in initiating cases, often with more absolutist positions than the national office. Though the affiliates had had a voice in deciding the national office's direction and policy since 1954, the organizational mechanism by which this was accomplished was cumbersome, changing several times. A workable method was found in 1967 with the creation of an 80-member board of directors comprised of representatives from all the affiliates and 30 at-large members. In addition, starting in 1959 and continuing to the present, the ACLU held biennial conferences to inform membership on pertinent topics, and to gather their views on civil liberties issues.

The Cold War and Civil Liberties

Historian Samuel Walker divides the ACLU's activities between 1950 and 1990 into four broad areas: Cold War issues, censorship, church/state, and civil rights. The beginning of the Cold War, the rise of Joseph McCarthy, and the re-emergence of the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) created an atmosphere of intolerance and suspicion that not only posed a threat to individual civil liberties but also destroyed the lives of many caught in the web spun by the Wisconsin Senator and his minions. The ACLU challenged the actions of McCarthy and HUAC on the tenet that only peoples' acts, not their beliefs, should be penalized; anything less infringed on First Amendment principle.

While the ACLU had not always lived up to these same principles (in 1940 it ousted board member Elizabeth Gurley Flynn for her membership in the Communist Party), by the early 1950s the ACLU did not hesitate to aid in the publication of Merle Miller's The Judges and the Judged. The book detailed HUAC's and McCarthy's red-baiting tactics, such as the prevalent use of unnamed (and hence unreliable or unanswerable) sources, guilt by association or exercise of one's Fifth Amendment rights, and other questionable means that resulted in blacklistings and firings of many in unions, the film industry, and the teaching profession. The ACLU called for the abolition of HUAC, attacked any measure that punished Communist Party members or denied them rights based solely on party membership (Kent v. Dulles, for example), and sought fair and open investigations for the accused. In testament to its strict adherence to principle, the ACLU reminded the United States Senate of its obligation to provide McCarthy a fair hearing when it began censure proceedings against him in 1954.

The ACLU may have stood up for the rights of the accused more readily in 1950 than it did in 1940 because Roger Baldwin had developed a quid pro quo with J. Edgar Hoover in which the ACLU did not publicize FBI civil rights violations, and high-level Union officers cooperated with the Bureau. Baldwin and others thought that this cooperation, in conjunction with the Flynn resolution, inoculated the Union against attack as a Communist-front organization, freeing it to spend its energies defending constitutional principle, not itself. This arrangement, shocking when revealed in later years, did not prevent the FBI from continuing its massive surveillance of the ACLU and its members.

Red hunters cited national security as the basis for their actions, a justification that the government would continue to invoke and one that the ACLU contested in such cases as the Pentagon Papers (U.S. v. New York Times), Watergate (U.S. v. Nixon), and Iran-Contra. In 1969, 13 years after Joseph McCarthy's death, the ACLU's vigilance bore the ultimate fruit in Brandenburg v. Ohio in which the Supreme Court ruled that the government only could punish direct incitement to lawless action, thereby invalidating the Smith Act and all state sedition laws that restricted radical political thought.

Censorship and Freedom of Speech

The cousin to McCarthyism's national security cause was the drive to protect people from printed materials and movies that promoted Communism or were perceived to erode community morals. Censorship attempts were, from the ACLU's point of view, a fundamental attack on free speech, and over the course of three decades the Union came to adopt an absolutist position, suffering no infringement in any form. Beginning with a 1952 Supreme Court victory in Burstyn v. McCaffrey in which the high court declared that states cannot prohibit the screening of films based on state-based standards, the ACLU rang up a string of court victories. These, combined with changing market pressures, brought a complete end to many common censorship practices by the 1960s (Jacobellis v. Ohio), including the sharp curtailment of post office censorship (Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc.).

In a related decision, the Supreme Court gave a boost to freedom of the press in New York Times v. Sullivan, which declared that public officials could not sue for defamation unless they proved "actual malice," thereby providing the media with heretofore unknown freedom to report critically.

Freedom of speech was extended, with the ACLU's assistance, by placing it above property rights in Pruneyard v. Robins, with the high court deciding that a shopping center could not forbid the distribution of political pamphlets on its premises.

Perhaps the most famous free speech issue of the ACLU's history, and certainly one that had the greatest impact on the organization, was the pitched battle over American Nazis' right to parade through Skokie, Illinois, in 1977. Half the town's 70,000 citizens were Jewish, and about 1,000 were Holocaust survivors, but this did not dissuade the ACLU (then headed by Aryeh Neier who was Jewish) from taking on the Nazis' cause in what the ACLU considered a "classic First Amendment case."

What the Union did not count on was a vigorous counterargument by the Jewish Defense League, or the loss of the support of its longtime ally, the American Jewish Congress. The ACLU won the court case, though the Nazis never marched in Skokie (ultimately parading at a site in downtown Chicago), but the highly publicized case caused a backlash resulting in a large drop in membership. Neier, who had assumed the executive director's post after the departure of John de J. Pemberton in 1970 and was accustomed to growing membership rolls and increasing budgets, found himself unable to reconcile the organization's activities with available funds and resigned. His successor, Ira Glasser, initiated an emergency appeal to supporters and raised over $500,000, allowing him to restructure organizationally and financially, thereby placing the ACLU back in the black and ready for the looming trials of the Reagan Revolution.

Church/State

The ACLU earned the enmity of many for its efforts in enforcing the separation of church and state. Working to end state-sanctioned forms of religion, predominantly mainstream Protestantism, the ACLU sought to abolish school prayer, various government subsidies for religious education, and other connections between government and religious activity. Starting in 1947 with Everson v. Board of Education, the court delineated the Establishment Clause, and the ACLU began to challenge long-entrenched government support for religious activity. Assailing school prayer, the ACLU won high court decisions to end it (Engel v. Vitale and Schempp v. Abington Township). It also refought the Scopes trial in Arkansas v. Epperson when the state of Arkansas had required the teaching of creationism as well as evolution.

Frequently working in conjunction with Protestants United for the Separation of Church and State (later Americans United for the Separation of Church and State) and the American Jewish Congress, the ACLU repeatedly clashed with the desires of the Roman Catholic Church on issues such as censorship, birth control, or school aid, often with the ACLU the victor. By the late 1960s, changes in public attitude toward church/state issues cemented the organization's gains, as many mainstream churches accepted the delineation. However, fundamentalist religions continued challenging laws on public prayer issues into the 1990s, with little effect (Wallace and Smith v. Jaffree). Often the affiliates bore the brunt of enforcement on church/state separation, acting to check sometimes frequent local infringements, thus proving Roger Baldwin's assertion that "no victory ever stays won."

Civil Rights

The First Amendment clearly delineates free speech protection and church/state separation, and it was easy for the ACLU to pick up the banner for these causes. However, most of the ACLU's work from the 1950s onward involved the more ambiguous and complex realm of civil rights—helping to secure the rights or expanding the concept of those same rights for those who had been denied them in the past, such as African Americans, women, homosexuals, children, the mentally ill, prisoners, and the accused. In this multifaceted arena, the ACLU found itself embroiled both internally and externally, as the national organization sought to define its mission even as state affiliates and regional offices acted on their own accord, usually pushing further and harder than the national organization planned to go.

For example, during the Vietnam War, ACLU moderates clashed with antiwar activists over the issue of representing Dr. Benjamin Spock, the famous pediatrician and prominent antiwar activist accused of interfering with the functions of government when he organized a “Stop the Draft” Week in 1968. Legal director Melvin Wulf first announced that the ACLU would represent Spock, only to be overruled by the national board, thus prompting the Massachusetts affiliate to take up Spock’s cause. Though ultimately the government would drop its case, pro-Spock members saw the case as an opportunity to raise questions about the Vietnam War’s legitimacy (as well as freedom of speech), while moderates viewed that issue as outside the ACLU’s scope. It also brought to the fore a long-simmering debate over whether the ACLU should participate directly in lawsuits or contribute amicus curiae (“friend of the court”) briefs to other cases. After reviewing its most recent past activity, the Union decided that it had de facto become directly involved in cases and would continue as such.

Despite the organizational turmoil, a discussion of the ACLU’s legal success under the civil rights rubric threatens to become a numbing list of historic Supreme Court decisions. Brown v. Board of Education, which overturned Plessy v. Ferguson and tolled the end of government-endorsed segregation, was one of many cases in which the ACLU worked together with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) to win rights for African Americans. The ACLU participated in all the major civil rights cases, arguing for freedom of speech and association rights that allowed the sit-ins, freedom rides, and other methods employed by the movement.

Other famous high court cases in which the ACLU partook include Griswold v. Connecticut, which recognized a right to privacy, thereby laying the foundation for future abortion rights decisions; both Tinker v. Des Moines and In re Gault recognized that minors enjoyed some Constitutional protection, especially in regard to freedom of speech and due process; and Miranda v. Arizona, Mapp v. Ohio, Escobedo Principle, and Gideon v. Wainwright, all of which expanded the rights of the accused, mandating an explanation of their rights and access to counsel, and placing limits on police action. (While these last cases caused many police groups to view the ACLU with hostility, the Union also defended a police officer’s right to belong to conservative political organizations such as the John Birch Society.)

As the concept of civil rights expanded, the ACLU started several special projects designed to focus solely on specific topics, including the Mental Health Law Project, the Project on Amnesty, the Privacy Project, the Women’s Rights Project, the Lesbian and Gay Rights Project, and Prisoners’ Rights Project. Each project worked not only to change the law but also to educate the public and raise their own funds.

Expansion Issues

The Children’s Rights Project is an example of how the ACLU changed itself from a small, centrally controlled organization to an expansive confederacy of groups working to advance the goal of civil liberties. With its roots in the 1970s and located at the national organization’s office in

New York City, the Children's Rights Project was one of the focused projects financially seeded by the national organization. In 1995 it had become successful enough to incorporate itself and separate from the ACLU organizationally, physically, and financially. Another sign of growth was the start of the regional offices. In addition to the Washington, D.C., office (established 1938), the Southern Regional Office in Atlanta was organized in 1964 and the Mountain States Regional Office in Denver a few years later. Each handled cases particular to its geographical areas, as well as the usual range of cases that interested the ACLU. This procedure led to varying interpretations of ACLU policy that resulted in the creation of the ACLU's official policy guides, issued first in 1966 and revised periodically. These guides represent the ACLU's attempt to coordinate and control the types of cases that the Union would take on and to shepherd resources along coordinated lines.

Unfortunately, the national organization had trouble determining what path to take, as many individuals within the organization pulled in different directions. Exacerbating this problem was the ACLU's restructuring, which attempted to reconcile the many voices in the civil liberties debate. After the first reorganization, which opened up policy-making to affiliates in 1954, the ACLU reorganized again in 1964, establishing a two-tiered system of governance in which affiliate representatives met twice a year and the board of directors in between. The dichotomy did not provide any stability, and three years later the Union reorganized once again, establishing its one-body 80-member board. Throughout this time the ACLU continued its board committees—some standing, others ad hoc—which focused on particular issues such as academic freedom or due process. In later years the rise of the special projects would overtake some of the committees' work, and the role of the committees would be reduced, though not eliminated.

The establishment of the Roger N. Baldwin/ACLU Foundation in 1967 was another major organizational change for the ACLU. The Union created the charitable fund-raising arm to pay attorneys to work on the ACLU's behalf, thereby signaling the end of the national organization's long-standing reliance on volunteer lawyers. Though volunteer attorneys continued to play a significant role in many of the affiliates, even there some groups, such as the New York and Southern California affiliates, had a history of paying for legal representation. The Foundation's purpose was to solicit funds from, among other places, other foundations, and during its early years much of its resources supported civil rights work in the South. In later years, it would provide initial funds for many of the special projects, gather any legal fees won by the project lawyers, and apply the funds against the project's overhead costs.

These changes reflected not only the organization's growth but also its expanding interpretation of what constituted civil liberties work. Starting with the civil rights movement and continuing through the Vietnam War and Watergate, the ACLU fought internally, often bitterly, over the scope and nature of its work. In this battle the broad interpreters of the Union's mission won out, as the organization took on cases involving abortion rights, women's rights, affirmative action, and other areas far from the basic principle of protecting First Amendment rights on which the Union was founded.

The 1980s and Early 1990s

The ACLU emerged from the 1970s a victor of many legal battles and organizationally strong. However, despite its track record and strength, the ACLU would not ring up a string of Supreme Court victories in the 1980s and 1990s as it had in the previous two decades. Public sentiment, long an ally in many areas, had shifted against the organization to the point that ACLU membership was identified as out of the mainstream. In the 1988 presidential election, GOP candidate George Bush, willfully unaware of nearly 50 years of Supreme Court decisions, echoed the phrase of Joseph McCarthy in calling his opponent, Michael Dukakis, a “card-carrying member of the ACLU” for his opposition to a flag-salute requirement. The Bush accusation reflected the state of public awareness of civil liberties in the 1980s as the ACLU refought a number of battles over such issues as censorship, school prayer, creationism, and abortion rights. In the area of censorship, the Union withstood challenges from both the Right and Left, the latter trying to censor publications under the rubric of protecting women. However, the ACLU stood firm in its belief in the absolute freedom of speech.

The U.S. Constitution and the Bill of Rights were written to guarantee that the rights of the minority would not be infringed upon by the majority. The ACLU’s accomplishments during the twentieth century helped to ensure that unpopular views would be tolerated and, indirectly, to remind people that it is an uncommon nation that commonly tolerates challenges to the majority.

Series Description

Legal Case Files, 1933-1990 [bulk dates 1960-1984] [Boxes 1196-1864a]

This series consists of legal case files that cover the widest range of civil liberties issues. It contains briefs and other pleadings, correspondence, memoranda, and notes. There are over 5,500 folders representing approximately 3,000 individual cases, many of which went before the U.S. Supreme Court. The Legal Files series is not a comprehensive representation of the cases in which the ACLU has been involved. Some records have yet to be transferred to Princeton and are still being maintained by the ACLU Legal Department. The series is arranged alphabetically by case or individual name. (In some instances, cases may be slightly out of order due to inaccuracies in determining case names.) Files may appear listed under either the plaintiff’s or the defendant’s names. Also some cases are filed under a subject heading such as “Gay Rights Task Force” or “Airport Searches.” One should also consult the MCA/UMI Microfilm guides for the case files series that may contain copies of ACLU legal briefs filed for many of the cases listed here.

Some important Supreme Court cases in which the ACLU participated that are documented in this series include:

Arkansas v. Epperson (1968): The Court ruled that Arkansas had violated the First Amendment, which forbids official religion, with its ban on teaching “that mankind ascended or descended from a lower order of animals.” [Box #1218]

Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969): After the ACLU’s 50-year struggle against laws punishing political advocacy, the Court now adopted the ACLU’s view of the First Amendment—that the government could only penalize direct incitement to imminent lawless action—and invalidated, in one fell swoop, the Smith Act and all state sedition laws restricting radical political groups. [Box #1254]

Brown v. Board of Education (1954): In perhaps the most far-reaching decision of the twentieth century, the Court declared racially segregated schools unconstitutional and overruled the “separate but equal” doctrine announced in the infamous 1896 Plessy v. Ferguson decision. [Box #1260]

Buckley v. Valeo (1976): Freedom of speech and association won a partial victory in this challenge to the limits on campaign spending imposed by amendments to the Federal Elections

Campaign Act. The Court struck down the Act's restrictions on spending "relative to a candidate" and its required disclosure of $100-plus political contributions. [Box #1272]

Burstyn v. McCaffrey (1952): Artistic freedom triumphed when the Court overruled its 1915 holding that movies "are a business, pure and simple," and decided that New York State's refusal to license "The Miracle" violated the First Amendment. The state censor had labeled the film "sacriligious." [Box #1274]

Cohen v. California (1970): Reversed the conviction of a man who allegedly disturbed the peace by wearing a jacket that bore the words, "Fuck the draft," while walking through a courthouse corridor. The Court rejected the notion that the state can prohibit speech just because it is "offensive." [Box #1303]

Collin v. Smith (1978): Related to Skokie v. National Socialist Party, the peculiar facts of this decision, one of the ACLU's most controversial First Amendment lawsuits ever, attracted enormous attention: American Nazis wanted to march through a Chicago suburb, Skokie, where many Holocaust survivors lived. The ACLU's challenge to the village's ban on the march was ultimately upheld. [Box #1304]

Doe v. Bolton (1970): Doe was the companion case of Roe v. Wade (1973), the famous abortion case that erased all existing criminal abortion laws and recognized a woman's constitutional right to terminate a pregnancy. In Doe, the Court ruled that whether an abortion is "necessary" is the attending physician's call, to be made in light of all factors relevant to a woman's well-being. [Box #1344]

Donaldson v. O'Connor (1975): The Court's first ruling on the rights of mental patients supported a nonviolent man who had been confined against his will in a state hospital for 15 years. Mental illness alone, said the Court, could not justify "simple custodial confinement" on an indefinite basis. [Box #1347]

Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972): Extending Griswold, this decision overturned the conviction of a reproductive rights activist who had given an unmarried woman in Massachusetts a contraceptive device. The Court held that allowing distribution of contraceptives to married, but not unmarried, people violated the equal protection clause. [Box #1364]

Engel v. Vitale (1962): In an 8-1 decision the Court struck down the New York State Regent's "nondenominational" school prayer, holding that "it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers." [Box #1365]

Escobedo Principle (1964): Invoking the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, the Court threw out the confession of a man whose repeated requests to see his lawyer, throughout many hours of police interrogation, were ignored. [Box #1370]

Everson v. Ewing Township (1947): The Court found school boards' reimbursement of the public transportation costs incurred by parents whose children attended parochial schools constitutional, but Justice Hugo Black's statement—"In the words of Jefferson, the clause . . . was intended to erect a wall of separation between church and State . . ."—was the Court's first major utterance on the meaning of Establishment Clause. [Box #1371]

In re Gault (1966): The most important landmark for juveniles, as it established specific due process requirements for state delinquency proceedings and stated, for the first time, the broad principle that young persons have constitutional rights. [Box #1398]

Gideon v. Wainwright (1963): Clarence Earl Gideon, an indigent drifter from Florida, made history when, in a handwritten petition, he persuaded the Court that poor people had the right to a state-appointed lawyer in noncapital criminal cases. [Box #1400]

Griswold v. Connecticut (1965): Among the twentieth-century's most influential decisions, it invalidated a Connecticut law forbidding the use of contraceptives on the ground that a right of "marital privacy," though not specifically guaranteed in the Bill of Rights, is protected by "several fundamental constitutional guarantees." [Box #1412]

Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc. (1946): A major blow against censorship. The Court severely limited the Postmaster General's power to withhold mailing privileges for allegedly "offensive" material. [Box #1423]

Holtzman v. Schlesinger (1973): A dramatic lawsuit, brought by the ACLU for a New York congresswoman, to halt the bombing of Cambodia as an unconstitutional Presidential usurpation of Congress's authority to declare war. After a federal order to stop the bombing was stayed on appeal, the ACLU sent a lawyer across the country to the remote vacation hideaway of Justice William O. Douglas, who vacated the stay and, though later overruled, succeeded in halting the bombing for a few hours. [Box #1439]

Jacobellis v. Ohio (1964): Justice Potter Stewart's famous statement, that although he could not define "obscenity," he "knew it when [he] saw it," crowned the Court's overturning of a cinema owner's conviction for showing "The Lovers," by Louis Malle. [Box #1455]

Kent v. Dulles (1958): The Court ruled that the State Department had exceeded its authority in denying artist Rockwell Kent a passport because he refused to sign a "noncommunist affidavit." The right to travel, said the Court, is protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. [Box #1475]

King v. Smith (1968): The Court invalidated a "man in the house" rule that denied welfare to children whose mother was living with a man, unmarried. The decision benefited an estimated 500,000 poor children, who had previously been excluded from aid. [Boxes #1477 and #1696]

Levy v. Louisiana (1968): The Court invalidated a state law that denied an illegitimate child the right to recover damages for a parent's death. The ruling established the principle that the accidental circumstance of a child's birth does not justify denials of rights. [Box #1499]

Loving v. Virginia (1967): A civil rights landmark that invalidated the anti-miscegenation laws of Virginia and 15 other southern states. The Court ruled that criminal bans on interracial marriage violate the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause and "the freedom to marry," which the Court called "one of the basic civil rights of man." [Box #1508]

Mapp v. Ohio (1961): A landmark in which the Court ruled that the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary rule, first applied to federal law enforcement officers in 1914, applied to state and local police as well. [Box #1514]

Miranda v. Arizona (1966): This famous decision established the "Miranda warnings," a requirement that the police, before interrogating suspects, must inform them of their rights. The Court embraced the ACLU's amicus argument that a suspect in custody has both a Sixth Amendment right to counsel and a Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. [Box #1549]

New York Times v. Sullivan (1964): A victory of freedom of the press. Public officials could not recover damages for defamation, ruled the Court, unless they could prove that a newspaper had impugned them with "actual malice." A city commissioner in Montgomery, Alabama, had sued over publication of a full-page ad written by civil rights activists. [Box #1584]

Poe v. Ullman (1961): Though unsuccessful, this challenge to Connecticut's ban on contraceptive sales set the stage for the Griswold decision of 1965. In a 33-page dissent, Justice John Harlan argued that the challenged law was "an intolerable invasion of privacy in the conduct of one of the most intimate concerns of an individual's private life." [Box #1626]

Pruneyard v. Robins (1980): A victory for freedom of expression as the Court rejected shopping mall owners' claim that their property rights compelled reversal of the California Supreme Court's requirement that a shopping center allow distribution of political pamphlets on its premises. [Box #1639]

Reed v. Reed (1970): A breakthrough women's rights decision that struck down a state law giving automatic preference to men over women as administrators of decedents' estates. For the first time, the Court ruled that sex-based—like race-based—classification violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. [Box #1645]

Rochin v. California (1952): Reversing the conviction of a man whose stomach had been forcibly pumped for drugs by a doctor at the behest of police, the Court ruled that the due process clause outlaws "conduct that shocks the conscience." [Box # 1657]

Schempp v. Abington Township (1963): Building on Engel v. Vitale in an 8-1 decision, the Court struck down Pennsylvania's in-school Bible-reading law as a violation of the First Amendment. [Box #1669]

Speiser v. Randall (1958): Arguing before the Court on his behalf, ACLU lawyer Lawrence Speiser won his challenge to a California law requiring that veterans sign a loyalty oath to qualify for a property tax exemption. [Box #1710]

Tinker v. Des Moines (1969): A landmark lift for symbolic speech and students' rights. The Court invalidated the suspension of public school students for wearing black armbands to protest the Vietnam War, writing that students did not "shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate." [Box #1735]

Trop v. Dulles (1958): An American stripped of his citizenship for being a deserter in World War II suffered cruel and unusual punishment, said the Court, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. [Box #1740]

U.S. v. New York Times (1971): The Pentagon Papers case, a landmark among prior restraint cases, in which the leaking of the Papers to the press for publication by Daniel Ellsberg, a former Defense Department official, did not, said the Court, justify an injunction against publication on national security grounds. [Boxes #1584 and #1773]

U.S. v. Nixon (1973): This test of Presidential power involved Richard Nixon's effort to withhold crucial Watergate tapes from Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski. In the only amicus brief filed, the ACLU argued: "There is no proposition more dangerous to the health of a constitutional democracy than the notion that an elected head of state is above the law and beyond the reach of judicial review." The Court agreed and ordered the tapes handed over. [Box #1774]

U.S. v. Seeger (1964): In one of the first Vietnam War decisions, the Court extended conscientious objector status to those who did not necessarily believe in a Supreme Being but who opposed war based on sincere beliefs that are equivalent to religious faith. [Box #1785]

U.S. v. Vuitch (1971): The Court's first abortion rights case involving a doctor's appeal of his conviction for performing an illegal abortion. The Court upheld the constitutionality of the statute used to convict, but it expanded the "life and health of the woman" concept to include psychological well-being, ruling that the prosecution must prove that the abortion was not necessary for a woman's physical or mental health. [Box #1795]

Wallace and Smith v. Jaffree (1988): This important church/state separation decision found Alabama's "moment of silence" law, which required public school children to take a moment "for meditation or voluntary prayer," in violation of the First Amendment's establishment clause. [Box #1816]

Watkins v. United States (1957): Under the First Amendment the Court imposed limits on the investigative powers of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, which had found a labor leader in contempt for refusing to answer questions about his associates' membership in the Communist Party. [Box #1825]
